 CHAPTER SEVEN

RECAPITULATION OF IDEAS: CHRISTIANITY AS REFLECTED IN RĪDA’S FATWĀS

We have already discussed the polemics of al-Manār on Christianity on different levels. In chapter three we have seen that Riḍā had opened the pages of his journal to some of his readers by publishing their reactions to missionary activities. As early as 1903, al-Manār published a poem by an anonymous reader under the title of Suʾālun fi al-Tathlīth (A Question on the Trinity). Signing his poem ٖس ٘ن، the poet challenged the Christians to prove that this doctrine was qadīm (primordial). The fact that it had never been explicitly mentioned in the teachings of previous prophets (especially Moses) proves that it was hādith (newly innovated).¹ We have also pointed out that missionary activity in Egypt reached its peak in the beginning of the 1930s. In June 1933, another reader under the name Ḥasan al-Dars, a police officer and a journalist in Cairo, wrote a poem which he entitled, Muhārabat al-Mubashshīn lil-’Islām fī Miṣr (Missionaries fighting Islam in Egypt), which Riḍā never published in his journal. In his long poem, al-Dars accused missionaries of being ‘charlatans,’ who used all means, such as hypnosis, to convert people. He was grieved by the ‘laxity’ of the government in combating their work.²

Riḍā’s interaction with his readers is best exemplified in his fatwā section.³ In this section, he illustrated many of his views on many a great deal of theological, scholarly, religious, and social issues. Beginning in 1903, firstly under the title ‘Questions and Answers’ (Suʾāl wā Jawāb), and later ‘Fatāwā al-Manār,’ he responded to a wide variety of queries from all over the world. This collection indicates that al-Manār was a remarkable record of interests and preoccupations of the Muslim world.⁴

¹ Al-Manār, vol. 6/6, pp. 225-226.
² Letter to Riḍā, Ḥasan al-Dars, 15 June 1933, Cairo, Riḍā’s private archive.
³ The whole collection of his fatwās has been collected in six volumes in 1970-1971 by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn al-Munajjid and Yāṣūf al-Khūrī, 6 vols., Beirut, 1976-77.
⁴ Dudoignon, ‘Echoes,’ pp. 85-116. More studies about Riḍā’s fatwās, see, Jajat Burhanudin, ‘Aspiring for Islamic Reform: Southeast Asian Requests for Fatwas in

This is an open access chapter distributed under the terms of the CC-BY-NC License.
It should be stressed that most of these petitions were submitted by Muslim readers; but there were also questions raised by Christians and missionaries. As we shall discuss, Riḍā’s answers to the Danish missionary Alfred Nielsen represented his only reaction to queries directly sent by an active missionary in the Middle East. We also encounter the name of the above-mentioned Coptic lawyer Akhnūkh Fanūs (see, chapter 2), who sent Riḍā a long message in which he discussed the differences between some Qur’ānic narratives and their equivalents in the Old Testament. We should remember that Fānūs was one of the pivotal figures behind the Coptic Congress, which Riḍā had strongly resisted in 1911. Riḍā published his brief reaction to his message as a fatwā in 1913.5 He reacted sharply, stressing that the Qur’ān was the Word of God and more trustworthy than the Biblical narratives written by Jewish historians. He divided Jewish narratives into two types: 1) divine as they contained the history of prophets, and 2) non-divine, such as the historical account of the Jewish historiographer Josephus. Riḍā stated that the Christian views of the narratives of the Old Testament were not always coherent, especially those on the stories of prophets. Muslims were therefore required not to trust their Scriptures, neither in the ‘literal,’ nor in the ‘figurative’ sense. They should be merely seen as historical records.6

7.1. Early Encounters

The first pertinent question was raised as early as 1902. In the minds of one of Riḍā’s readers there were some theological problems as to the narratives on the nuzūl (descending) of Jesus before the end of 5 Al-Manār, vol. 16/7, (Rajab 1331/July 1913), p. 520. In 1904, Riḍā published a poem by Fanūs on the Russo-Japanese War, and the reason behind Japan’s progress in many fields. al-Manār, vol. 7/19 (Shawwāl, 1322/December 1904), p. 752. See also Riḍā’s criticism to Fanūs and his role in the Coptic Congress in 1911; al-Manār, vol. 14/3, pp. 216-17.

---

6 Al-Manār, vol. 16/7, (Rajab 1331/July 1913), p. 520.
the world. And would his return as a prophet contradict the concept of the Prophet Muḥammad as the seal of prophecy? 7

Riḍā confirmed that Muslims were not required to believe in the return of Jesus because there was no related qat′ī (definite) Qurʾānic text. All Ḥadīths related to this issue, mostly from Abū Hurairah, were ahād (narrated by a small number people) or gharīb (odd). In matters of ‘Āqīda (doctrine), one should depend on definite and mutawāṭir traditions. Riḍā furthermore disagreed with those who quoted the Qurʾān in order to support this element of doctrine. He gave different interpretations to the two verses related to this issue. The verse: ‘And there is none of the People of the Book but must believe in him before his death’ (al- Nisāʾ, 4:159) was actually mentioned in the context of the claims of Christians about Jesus as the Son of God. In the fatwā, Riḍā employed the same arguments he used in the Tafsīr which we have already discussed in the previous chapter. The verse refers to a group of the People of the Book who revert to the true belief in Jesus as God’s prophet immediately before their death. To take the verse as proving the descending of Jesus, and that people will believe in him before his natural death before the Day of Resurrection, was, in his view, inaccurate. The narratives concerning the coming of Jesus only became known after the circulation of the manuals of the two Shaykhs (Al-Bukhārī and Muslim). 8

Despite his refusal to accept the return of Jesus on the basis of the Qurʾān, Riḍā insisted on making his own comparison between the concept of the Messiah in Judaism, Christianity and Islam. The Jews, in his view, expected their messiah who will renew the kingdom of Israel. Riḍā alluded that as they are desirous for wealth, the Jews predicted somebody who would consolidate their ‘materialistic’ aspirations on earth. The Christians expected the return of theirs in order to re-establish his Kingdom and the Cross. But Muslims believed that Jesus will return and ‘break the cross, kill the swine, put an end to the payment of the jizya (the poll tax on the People of the Book), establish the Islamic Sharīʿa, and observe the Muslim prayer in order

---

7 Ahmad effendi ʿAbd al-Ḥalīm from Shibīn al-Kūm (Egypt), ‘Nuzūl al-Masīḥ,’ vol. 5/4 (Ṣafar 1320/May 1902), pp. 135-138. Riḍā gave a similar answer on the ascension of Jesus to Heaven to a question raised by a certain Ahmad Ismāʿīl al-Quṭb, a subscriber to al-Manār from Lebanon, see, ‘Ṣuʿūd al-Sayyid al-Masīḥ ʿilā al-Samāʾ,’ vol. 14/7 (Rajab 1329/July 1911), p. 507.

8 Ibid., 137.
to make it clear that Islam is the true religion.’

Riḍā however argued that some Christians believed in the return of Jesus not in the physical sense. They interpreted his ‘return’ as referring to his ‘good attributes and sermons of love, peace and brotherhood.’ In the same sense, Riḍā metaphorically elucidated the word nuzūl in the Hadith as that the descending of Jesus would be exemplified in the propagation and loftiness of Islam as the true religion of God. The Christians will also comprehend the nature of Jesus to be a man, in the same way as the Muslims believe in Muḥammad.

Concerning the second point of the question, Riḍā confirmed that the notion of the Prophet Muḥammad as the seal of prophecy was confirmed by means of mutawātir and definite traditions; and there was no need to interpret it in the light of other aḥād narratives such as that about the return of Jesus.

In 1903, a habitual mustaftī (petitioner) of al-Manār under the name Aḥmad Muḥammad al-‘Alfī, a regional scholar in the town of Tūkh nearby Cairo, wondered why many Christians, despite being highly qualified and having significantly contributed to the Arabic language, still insist on disbelieving in the Qurʾān as the final and true revelation. Some of them, he went on, already admitted its miraculous nature, but rejected its divine origin out of ‘stubbornness’: Why did eloquent Christian men of letters adhere to Christianity, and ignore the ‘contradictions, the broken chain of transmission, and the opposition to logic in the Christian Scriptures? Why did they leave the Qurʾān with its ‘wise’ message and ‘beautiful’ style aside?

Riḍā answered that those Christians insisted on adopting their religion only as a matter of ‘nationality’ and a socio-political bond. They preserved its religious symbols of doctrines, traditions in order to keep their national and religious unity intact. In Riḍā’s thinking, they did not study Islam with due fairness in order to understand its origins. However, the ‘vices’ widespread among Muslims made the ‘merits’ of Islam invisible to the fair-minded among them. Riḍā

---

9 Ibid., pp. 137-38.
10 Ibid., pp. 138-139.
11 Ibid.
12 ‘Bayān al-Qurʾān wā Balāghatuh wā mā yuhimu dhālik,’ al-Manār, vol. 6/12, pp. 461-466. About questions by the same person see, vol. 4/6 (Ṣafar 1319/May 1901), pp. 221-22; vol. 4/7, pp. 256-57; vol. 4/8 (Rabiʿ al-ʾAwwal 1319/June 1901), p. 303; vol. 6/10, pp. 373-74; vol. 6/12, pp. 461-62; vol. 14/2, pp. 99-100.
moreover spelled out that most of the well-versed Christian Arab linguists hardly looked at the Qurʾān in an objective way. Their ‘ethnical enmity’ against Islam, he further argued, frequently prevented them from saying the truth about the Qurʾān’s miraculous (muʾjiz) nature. However, he excluded the group of those who reached another conclusion, viz. that the language of the Qurʾān is miraculous, such as the above-mentioned Christian Lebanese linguist Jabr effendi Ḏumīṭ in his book al-Khawātir al-Ḥisān. Ṣidā assured his petitioner that most of the educated and rational Christians did not believe in the Trinity, and a group of them had frequently informed him that they were entirely sceptical about their religion.

In 1904, an unnamed Tunisian questioner asked Ṣidā whether a Muslim was allowed to read non-Muslim scriptures, such as the Torah, only for the sake of acquiring knowledge about their contents. He suggested that should Muslims be prohibited from reading other scriptures, non-Muslims would be more knowledgeable and stronger than Muslims, since they were not discouraged by their religion to study the Qurʾān. For Ṣidā, reading other scriptures for the purpose of supporting the truth of Islam and refuting the allegations of others was highly recommended. He even considered this act as a matter of ʿĪbāda (worship); and in many cases this should become a duty. As early Muslim scholars had been reading other scriptures in order to deduce proofs from them, Ṣidā deemed it an obligation upon himself and other contemporary scholars to combat missionary writings on Islam by reading Christian scriptures and disproving them. In order to avoid disturbance in their beliefs, Ṣidā discouraged common Muslims and young students to read the books of other religions. He compared the state of those Muslims with a ‘crow’ who tried to learn the way of walking of a ‘peacock.’ As soon as the crow acquired the peacock’s way of walking, it would totally forget its former nature.

---

13 Jabr Ḏumīṭ, al-Khawātir al-Ḥisān fī al-Maʿānī wā al-Bayān, Cairo, 1896.
14 ‘Muṭālaʿat Kutub al-Milal Ghayr al-ʾIslāmiyya,’ al-Manār, vol. 7/7, pp. 262-263.
15 Ibid., p. 263.
7.2. Are Christians Unbelievers?

Muḥammad Effendi Ḥilmī, a secretary at the Prisons of Halfa (Sudan), put a question to Riḍā concerning the eternal abide of unbelievers and Christians in the Fire.16 Riḍā expounded that the Qurʾān is clear-cut in stating that the Kāfirūn (unbelievers) and Munāfiqūn (hypocrites) abide eternally in the Fire, except whom the Lord wills to be saved. The scholars interpreted the concept of Khulūd (eternity) in this case as Mukth (eternal residence) in a similar way as in the other verse: ‘If a man kills a Believer intentionally, his recompense is Hell, to abide therein for ever’ (al-Nisāʾ 4:93). Muslim theologians were also of the opinion that anyone who knew about Islam on a sound basis stimulating his contemplation, while he did not believe out of stubbornness and rigidity, was eternally destined to the Fire. However, they excluded those who had not received the message properly or those who studiously and seriously investigated Islam, but did not manage to discover the truth before their death.

Another petitioner had some doubts about the authenticity of the Ḥadith of the Fitra (God’s way of creating or His plan): ‘Every infant is born according to the Fitra, then his parents make him a Jew or a Christian or a Magian.’17 Riḍā explained that every infant is born ready to ‘promote’ himself by accepting Islam as agreeable with God’s original nature of creation. The infant later will be taught other psychological and physical behaviours which might influence his nature. When parents (or anybody playing their role) bring up their children according to beliefs other than Islam, they will be creating in the character of their children other traditions opposing the Fitra. Riḍā concluded that Christian parents, for example, raise their children to believe that all human beings have been created by nature with ‘evil’ and ‘sin.’ They also teach them that salvation and happiness could be reached if they believe in the Crucifixion, which Riḍā defined as a change in their Fitra.18

In another fatwā on the belief of the People of the Book, Riḍā made his points clearer. He gave the example that their belief was like a

---

16 ‘Khulūd al-Kāfir fī al-Nār,’ vol. 7/7, pp. 258-259; questions by the same person, see, vol. 6/13 (Rajab 1321/September 1903), p. 510; vol. 6/17, p. 672, vol. 7/4, p. 141
17 Al-Manār, vol. 8/1 (Muḥārram 1323/March 1905), pp. 18-20; a certain ʿAbdullāh Sulaymān sent the question from Suez. In his comment, based on the question, Riḍā found him a ‘strange man.’
18 Ibid.
group of slaves whose master left them his farm in order to reconstruct it and avail themselves from its crops. Later he sent them a more educated and well-informed slave with a manual of other instructions and duties. They followed that manual, but soon abandoned it after the death of the slave. They were ‘tempted’ to discard their work according to his manual, replacing it by extravagant veneration of the slave instead of exerting efforts to keep the farm cultivated. Riḍā followed the line of Abū Ḥāmid Al-Ghazālī (d. 1111) who maintained that those who died after having conducted deep investigation, but did not reach the truth of Islam before their death, would be forgiven in the Hereafter. Such people are excused until they have a real opportunity to learn about the ‘truth’ of Islam.19

7.3. A Kuwaiti Petitioner on Slavery in the Bible

In the Gulf region, there were slave-holding areas even until the 1950s, despite official out-lawing of the slave trade. In their writings, missionaries in Kuwait and Bahrain were critical of the institution of slavery.20 In response to many questions, Riḍā published opinions on slavery. Sulaymān al-ʿAdasānī (d. 1957), al-Manār’s agent and Riḍā’s informant in Kuwait, requested Riḍā to dwell upon the concept of captivity and slavery in the Bible. The reason for the query was to respond to the objections to Islam as an ‘anti-humane’ and ‘barbaric’ religion.21 Al-ʿAdasānī had several debates with Christian missions in his homeland. In a letter to Riḍā, he mentioned a well-circulated missionary pamphlet in Kuwait entitled: Ḥusn al-ʾIJāz fī Ibṭāl al-ʾIjāz (The Best Refutation of the Unapproachable Eloquence) by a certain

---

19 Al-Manār, vol. 13/8 (Sha’bān 1328/September 1910), pp. 572-574. See, Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī, Faysal al-Tafriqa Bayna al-ʾIslām wā al-Zandaqa, edited by Sulaymān Dunyā, Cairo, 1961, pp. 206-208.
20 Eleanor Abdella Doumato, ‘An ‘Extra Legible Illustration of the Christian Faith’: Medicine, Medical Ethics, and Missionaries in the Arabian Gulf,’ in Eleanor H. Tejirian & Reeva Spector Simon, eds., Altruism and Imperialism: The Western Religious and Cultural Missionary Enterprise in the Middle East, Middle East Institute, Colombia University, 2002, pp.167-182; G.E. Dejong, ‘Slavery in Arabia,’ The Muslim World 24, 1934, pp. 127-31. More about slavery in Kuwait, see, Suzanne Miers, Slavery in the Twentieth Century, Rowman Altamira, 2003, pp. 164-172.
21 ‘al-Saby wā al-Riqq fī al-Tawrāh wa al-ʾInjil,’ vol. 17/9 (Ramaḍān 1332/August 1914), pp. 658-661.
Nuṣayr al-Dīn al-Zāfīrī, whose aim was to disapprove the Qurʿān’s claim of eloquence.22

In his answer, Riḍā did not cite any specific sources. His reply was based on lengthy quotations from the Bible which he saw as encouraging slavery. He continued to elucidate that there was ample evidence that captivity and slavery were permitted in ancient legislations. He pointed for instance to the Biblical narrative that Abraham’s brother had been taken captive (Genesis 14:14). The Mosaic Law had also allowed the Israelites to take ‘the children of the strangers’ as their ‘bondmen forever’ (Leviticus 25:46). Riḍā argued that these Biblical passages stated that it had not been permitted to free any foreign slave. The Israelites, on the other hand, were requested to free their Hebrew slaves during the year of Jubilee, except those who showed a desire to remain in eternal slavery. Riḍā went further and applied his analysis of these Biblical passages to the Zionist movement. He expected that once they had completely seized Palestine and established their laws, they will ‘root out’ all native inhabitants and keep them in slavery forever. In his view, the Israelites were likewise asked not to set a king over themselves who was ‘a stranger’ and not a ‘brother’ (Deuteronomy 17:15). Riḍā referred to another passage as responsible for the subjugation of female captives. According to Deuteronomy, when an Israelite saw among the captives a beautiful woman, and had a desire to have her as his wife, he should bring her home. She had to shave her head, and pare her nails (21:11-14). As for the Gospels, Riḍā pointed out that they endorsed slavery in the same manner as the Romans. It neither demanded masters to free their slaves nor to be lenient with them. In many places it was stressed that servants should be submissive to their masters ‘with all fear’ and ‘according to the flesh, with fear and trembling’ (Ephesians 6:5-8; Colossians 3:22-25; I Peter 2:18-20).

In this fatwā, Riḍā did not exemplify the Islamic rules of slavery in details, but referred the questioner to other articles in al-Manār

---

22 Al-ʿAdasānī was the founder of the first public library in Kuwait. He later became a member of the Kuwaiti Legislative Council. See, http://www.moe.edu.kw/schools-2/mobarak_alkabeer/moqraratschools/boys/Wschool/nbza.asp; accessed on 25 January 2008.

In Riḍā’s archive, I found about 30 letters sent by the petitioner. The treatise was published by the American Press in Cairo (Bulaq, 1912, 24pp). The title is to be listed in the Summer 1914 Edition, op. cit., p. 13.
on the subject. 23 In this way he rebuked those who criticised Islam as an unjust religion towards slaves. Unlike Judaism and Christianity, he argued, Islam never made slavery an obligation, but allowed it for specific reasons. Riḍā looked at the role of slaves in that sense in a positive way. In the case of war and the murder of most of the male members of the clan, slaves had always been of great benefit in taking care of children and women. Islam always demanded masters to treat their slaves on an equal footing, even in giving them the same food and clothes; and never to humiliate or afflict them with heavy work. 24

7.4. An Aḥmādi Petitioner

In 1915, Shir ʿAli, the director of the Aḥmādi quarterly Review of Religions (firstly published in 1902) in Punjab, made a statement that al-Manār’s interpretation of the phrase muṣaddiqan limā bayna yadayhi (lit. confirming which is between his hands) was an eye-opener for him. This phrase is often mentioned in the Qurʾān as a testimony to other holy books. Al-Manār made a distinction between ‘ṣaddaqa lahu’ (a non-transitional verb with the preposition lām) and ‘ṣaddaqa bihi’ (a non-transitional verb with the preposition bā). The former refers to ‘verification and confirmation,’ whereas the latter means ‘completion, or implementation of the purport of something.’ The usage of the concept by the Qurʾān referred to the former meaning of verification, only. According to Shir ʿAli, this interpretation might remove the misunderstanding between Muslims and Christians concerning the testimony of the Qurʾān to their scriptures. Shir ʿAli had heard about this interpretation, but did not read al-Manār himself. The significance of it lay in the fact that he, as a Muslim missionary in India, was indebted to Riḍā whose arguments regularly endorsed his debates with Christian missionaries. 25

23 Riḍā dealt with the issue of slavery in al-Manār in many other places. In 1910, for example, he received a group of questions on the issue from a certain Muḥammad Mukhtār from Paris, see vol. 13/10 (Shawwāl 1328/November 1910), pp. 741-744.

24 Al-Manār, vol. 17/9. Later in 1922, Riḍā clung to the notion that Muslims were obliged to retain slavery if their enemies did so, to improve their bargaining position. Towards the end of his life, he even opined that servitude could be a refuge for the poor and weak, notably, women, and could give all women a chance to bear children. See, William Gervase Clarence-Smith, Islam and the Abolition of Slavery, London: Hurst & Oxford University Press, 2006, pp. 205-206.

25 Al-Manār, vol. 18/3 (Jumāda al-ʿŪlā 1333/14 April 1915), pp. 178-180.
Riḍā explained to Shir ʿAlī that the interpretation was not his own, but had been formulated earlier by Tawfīq Ṣidqī in one of his polemical treatises. Riḍā added to the interpretation more linguistic analyses of some theological connotations. The verb şaddaqa could be used in the Qurʾān as mutaʿaddî bî nafsihî (transitional form in itself) and has two meanings: 1) the Prophet verbally conveyed the truth of the Jewish and Christian messages, or 2) his mission, supported by his ‘merits and deeds,’ confirmed his prophecy on the coming of other scriptures. Riḍā agreed that the non-transitional verb muṣaddiqan limā was only used for confirmation, but the other way around, viz. the other scriptures contained clear prophecies, which confirmed the coming of the prophet Muḥammad and the message of Islam.

7.5. A Lutheran Danish Missionary in Riḍā’s Fatwās

Riḍā was never reluctant to publish his own debates with missionaries in his Manār, and opened its pages for their questions. He thought that this was the best way to raise the Muslims’ awareness of the missionary movements of his time. He published three fatwās on Christian missions, whose questions had been raised by the Danish missionary Pastor Alfred Julius Nielsen (1884-1963), a Lutheran missionary in Syria and Palestine.26

It is worth noting that Nielsen had worked for some time in Riḍā’s village, and was a subscriber to al-Manār.27 He was also keen on having correspondences with other Muslim scholars in Palestine, in which he discussed many theological aspects of the Bible and the Qurʾān. He was much interested in promoting tolerance and the free

---

26 For more details, see, Ryad, ‘Nielsen.’ See also, Nielsen’s articles and the reviews on his Danish works, ‘Koranen og Biblen (Book Review, by S. Zwemer),’ The Moslim World 12, 1922, p. 210; ‘Skildringer af Syriske Medarbejdere (Book Review, by S. Zwemer),’ The Moslim World 12, 1922, p. 211; ‘Bag Libanons Bjerige (Book Review),’ The Moslim World 12, 1922, p. 211; ‘Damascus as a Mission Center,’ The Moslim World 13, 1923, pp. 160–166; ‘Difficulties in Presenting the Gospel to Moslems,’ The Moslim World 19, 1929, pp. 41–46; ‘Moslem Mentality in the Syrian Press,’ The Moslim World 20, 1930, pp. 143–163; Muhammad Tankegang i vore Dage, Copenhagen, 1st ed., 1930; ‘Muhammedask Tankegang I vore Dage (Book Review, by Zwemer),’ The Moslim World, 20, 1930, p. 426; ‘The Islamic Conference at Jerusalem,’ The Moslim World 22, 1932, pp. 339–354; ’Colloquial Arabic,’ The Moslem World 34, 1944, pp. 218–219; ‘Comparison,’ The Moslem World 39, 1949, pp. 1–5.

27 Letter, anonymous to ʿAbd al-Rāziq Ḥamzah, Damascus, 15 Rabiʿ al-Thānī 1343, Riḍā’s archive in Cairo.
Christianity as Reflected in Ṣa’dū’s fatwās

As a liberal theologian, Nielsen argued that ‘the Christians of the Near East were to lose nothing, if they would abandon Christianity and become Muslims.’ It was not important for him that Christians and Muslims might reach an ultimate conclusion with each other as regard to the concept of Salvation; but they should live as ‘brothers.’ In its review of one of his Arabic treatises, the Jesuit magazine al-Machreq severely criticised Nielsen for his overzealous goals by ‘treading a wicked road.’ It also considered his views ‘a slap in the face of Christians.’

Ṣa’dū’s three fatwās for Nielsen contained interesting arguments, which were rarely found in the Muslim-Christian controversy of that time. They were unique in the sense of being a face-to-face debate between a Muslim theologian and a Christian missionary. Ṣa’dū’s answers did not only dealt with his conception of the missionary work, but contained some reflections on a few theological issues as well.

The first fatwā (1924) dealt with Nielsen’s questions on several points, such as the Muslim perception of the upright missionary work which does not attack Islam, and learning the Bible as it is the basis of Western civilisation. In his answer, Ṣa’dū amply vindicated that the Muslim, with the knowledge and reason given to him, can distinguish between good missions whose work was fair and included no defamation or obscenity of other religions. The Muslim, according to him, could differentiate between zealous Christians and most missionaries who exploited it in politics and retained religious fanaticism. Ṣa’dū evaluated all missions working among Muslims as corrupting and indecent due to their ‘bad’ behaviour, which had been attested. A decent missionary approach, however, was acceptable. His own experience convinced him that there were some individuals who preached their religion on the basis of manifesting its values, standing up for their convictions on the basis of solid knowledge, and keeping abreast of honesty and blamelessness. He lived among such Christians

28 The Moslem World 25, 1935, pp. 411–422. He also co-published a treatise entitled as, Afkār Muʾminīn fī Haqāʿiq al-Dīn: li-mādhā atbaʿu Dinī dūna Ghayrih, with a certain Ḥabīl al-Qayshāwī of Palestine. See, W. Bjorkman, Die Welt des Islams 20, 1938, p. 139.
29 As quoted in, al-Machreq, vol. 33 (1935), p. 470.
30 Ibid.
31 Ibid., pp. 470–471.
in his hometown. He had many debates with them, and they used to respect each other.32

As for the point of learning the Bible, Riḍā stated it was not true that it was the duty of every enlightened person to know the Bible. It was only the duty of the scholars who specialised in religious sciences. He also rejected Nielsen’s statement that Western civilisation is based on the Holy Book. This allegation, according to him, was absurdly formulated by the missionaries in order to win over those who were dazzled by the European civilisation. The association between Western civilisation and the Bible was not plausible. In his mind, Western laws had no connection whatsoever with the legislation of the Torah. Nor did the morals of Western people have any relation whatsoever with the body of ethics included in the Gospel. The civilisation of the West, he believed, was lustful and materialistic, and mainly based on arrogance, conceit and the adoration of money, covetousness, and extravagance in embellishment and lusts. On the contrary, the principles of the Gospel were founded on modesty, altruism, asceticism, truthfulness, the renunciation of embellishment, and the abandonment of lusts. The dissemination of sciences and arts in the West was not due to the spread of missionary groups there. Riḍā stressed that the impact of religion on nations was at its strongest and most complete in the early stages of guidance. Once a nation reaches its full blossoming, religion gradually becomes weaker. For many centuries, even after the spread of Christianity, the West remained without the application of any principle of the sciences and arts. All these concepts were originally transferred from the Arabs and Muslims to Europe. ‘It should be borne in mind that,’ he wrote, ‘the propagators of these concepts in Europe were tyrannised and ill-treated by “the Holy Group” and its defenders in the courts of Inquisition. Had the West acquired the religion of the Arabs from the East, just as it had acquired their knowledge and wisdom, it would have been perfect in both religious and worldly matters, and it would not have been entirely materialistic as it is today.’33

Riḍā was persuaded that the Bible was not a ‘virtue’ which everybody should appreciate. Appreciation should be only given to things of real benefit. Missionary activities had proved to be tragic and catastrophic wherever they worked. He challenged Nielsen to bring him any justification necessitating the gratitude of Muslims to Christian missions. The high esteem that Riḍā gave to the Qurʾān stimulated him to maintain that ‘if any Muslim, who is aware of the true nature of Islam, studies the Bible, he will be more convinced that the Qurʾān is given priority over all books, superior to them, and has the soundest judgement among them all.’ Furthermore, Riḍā predicted a total fiasco for missionary work among Muslims. The real Muslim believing in his religion on the basis of true knowledge and firm belief should not fear any ‘call’ for any other religion. Riḍā quoted al-Afghānī who said that the Muslim could never become a Christian because Islam is Christianity with additions. Having decided on something perfect, Riḍā added, one would never accept a subordinate alternative.

---

32 Ryad, ‘Nielsen,’ pp. 96-99.
33 Ibid.

He attempted, for instance, to hit straight at the doctrine of Trinity: one of the most vulnerable spots, which Muslims always took into account in the opposition with Christian dogma. His very premise started from the argument that Muslim theologians are of the agreement that there is no logical impossibility in Islam (muḥāl ʿaqīlan). This means: a Muslim is never required to believe in anything that is logically impossible. If he once encounters anything which seems to be in rational or practical conflict with a definitive proof, it should be interpreted as an attempt of reconciliation between the rationale and the text on the basis of the Qurʾānic passage: ‘On no soul doth Allah place a burden greater that it can bear. It gets every good that it earns, and suffers every ill that it earns’ (al-Baqara, 2: 286). Riḍā argued that religions other than Islam required people to believe in what is rationally impossible, i.e., the reconciliation between the two antitheses or opposites, such as the real Unity and the real Trinity. In other terms, that God is truly one, and truly more than one at the same time. Putting in mind that he was in debate with a Christian missionary, Riḍā argued that unlike the life of the Prophet Muhammad, there was little historical information about previous Prophets, including the record of the life of Jesus in the four Gospels.

Riḍā’s due respect for Nielsen was explicitly noted in the fatwās. One rarely met in missionary circles, he commented, someone who

---

34 Ibid.
35 Ibid.
36 Ibid.
37 Ibid.
would write in such a confident way like this Danish missionary. Riḍā had no respect for Christians with extravagant evangelistic ideas. Those who preached their religion with firm conviction and submission, such as Nielsen, were to be respected by any sensible person.38

Only one year later (1925), Riḍā published an answer to another question sent by Nielsen, who bluntly challenged Riḍā by asking why he repudiated the ‘call of Christianity,’ despite being quite aware of Christian sources. In his reply, Riḍā gave a brief outline of the reasons why he firmly upheld Islam as the true religion. He maintained that it had been proved to him that the Prophet Muḥammad was ummī (illiterate). He was never a disciple of any scholar of theology, history, law, philosophy, or literature. Neither was he an orator, nor a poet. Thereupon Riḍā proceeded to speak about the qualities of the Prophet Muḥammad:

Unlike the people of his age at Mecca, the prophet Muḥammad was not keen on leadership, fame, pride or eloquence. He was very renowned for his good disposition, truthfulness, honesty, decency, austerity, and all other kinds of good morals to the degree that they used to call him al-ʿAmīn [the honest]. At his maturity of age he maintained to be a prophet sent by Allah for all people. His message was to preach the same message of other prophets before him.39

In view of these reasons, Riḍā underlined that he was firmly convinced of the message of Islam. The Qurʾān foretold many things, which had been unknown among the people of Mecca during that time. The most important among these things, he argued, was the corruption and alterations made by the Christians and the Jews in their Books. It had been revealed in the Qurʾān that the Jews and the Christians had twisted the truth by corrupting their Scriptures, a fact which was verified by modern Western scholars.

The controversy around the book of the Egyptian Ṭaha Ḥusayn on Pre-Islamic Poetry (1926)40 and his understanding of the place of the prophet Abraham in Islamic history was a turning point in the Riḍā-Nielsen discussion. Nielsen’s inquiries centred upon the Muslim-Christian critique of each other’s scriptures as understood in the term Taʾn (defamation). Nielsen aggressively blamed Riḍā for his rooted hostile attitudes to missionaries when he stated that it was always their duty to defame Islam. He raised the important question whether it was possible to declare the Muslim, who would still be committed to Islam in both religious and moral aspects, as unbeliever, if he (such as in the case of Ḥusayn) reached a conclusion that might contradict the Qurʾān and the Islamic creed through his scientific methods and research.

38 Ibid.
39 Ibid., pp. 99-100.
40 Ṭāha Ḥusayn, Fi al-Shīr al-Jāhili, Cairo: Matbaʿat Dār al-Kutub al-Miṣriyya, 1st ed., 1926.

Nielsen raised his questions to Riḍā because he did not want to put any other argument against Islam than what Muslims themselves would agree upon. At the same time, he believed that enlightened Muslims were expected very soon to change their attitudes towards the Qurʾān by distinguishing between religious and moral matters, on the one hand, and scientific and historical ones on the other. Imbued by his Lutheran background, Nielsen insinuated that this would lead to the same conclusions reached by the Christians of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. The belief of those scholars of the infallibility in the Bible was different from those of the eighteenth century, despite the fact that both Christian generations shared the same belief in Jesus as the only Saviour mediator between God and mankind. In addition, Nielsen predicted some changes in the Muslim world. He saw, for instance, the coming of modernist movements and magazines in Turkey and elsewhere in the Muslim world as a signal for a new and similar trend within Islam in the near future.41

Riḍā clearly pointed out that the Christian Scriptures were not binding for Muslims. He lexically defined the word Ṭāʿn as originally used to mean, ‘to thrust or stab a spear or a lance,’ which was also designated to mean ‘to rebuke, insult, deny, and orally disregard.’ The parallel between both definitions was that the latter spiritually hurt the person, just like the former did in a material sense. What Ṭāḥa Ḥusayn (a Muslim himself) wrote in his book ‘painfully hurt’ Muslims, so it was valid to say that he rebuked Islam. But Riḍā made it clear that it would be no Ṭāʿn if any Muslim, Christian, or Jew attempted to deal with the Book(s) of the others. The same holds true, according to him, for the things in which they did not believe and what they might see as contradictory to their own religion, so long as they did not go beyond ‘moral obligations’ in their critique. For example, he deemed neither what Nielsen wrote about Islam in formulating his questions, nor his reply to them as Ṭa’n.42

41 Ryad, ‘Nielsen,’ p. 101.

Referring to Nielsen’s comparison between the changing attitudes of enlightened Christians and Muslims, Riḍā did not accept the concept that enlightened Muslims, like the Christians in the passage of time, might change their belief in the Qur’ān. He strongly disagreed that they would ever make distinction between the religious and moral matters as infallible on the one hand, and the historical ones as vulnerable to criticism, on the other. Such a comparison sprang to Nielsen’s mind, Riḍā believed, because of his interest of drawing an analogy between Islam and Christianity, and the Qur’ān and the Bible.

Regarding the denial of the historical existence of Adam, Ibrāhīm and Ismā’īl, Riḍā consistently maintained that the existence or the non-existence of anybody, who was said to have lived in long past eras, was not to be proved by scientific methods, in so far as this was not logically impossible. Nobody could deny the existence of someone called ‘Ibrāhīm, as far as it was not logically impossible. At any rate, the very premise of the possibility of his existence, Riḍā contended, was supported by the Revelation according to both the Children of Israel and the Arabs. In support of his argument, Riḍā discussed at considerable length the denial of the existence of some generally recognised men in history. He, furthermore, lamented that suspicions had been expressed against the existence of famous persons, for instance by those who denied the existence of Jesus on the ground of the historical account of the Jewish historiographer Josephus, who was contemporary to Jesus. He did not allude to him in his writings on Jewish history, though he paid much attention to less important events. Riḍā refuted this suspicion by pointing out that Josephus must have concealed this fact in his writings fearing that he would have been considered as a preacher of the Christian message. He deliberately did not want to give his readers any suggestion that he was a believer in the message of Jesus. The other two examples were Homer, the Greek poet, and Ḥmrul Qays, the Arab poet. Homer was asserted to have been an imaginary mythical character, to whom the Greeks attributed many eloquent poems. As for the second example, it was said that the poetry of Qays was composed during the Umayyad Empire, but that somebody had attributed it to him. Apparently Riḍā intentionally referred to the example of the pre-Islamic poetry of Qays, as it was the core of Ḥusayn’s book.⁴³

42 Ibid., p. 102

In Riḍā’s vocabulary, Muslim scholars were unanimous, the same as the ‘People of the Book,’ on the point that there must be a distinction in religion between the principal theological matters, the rituals and legislations on the one hand, and what was mentioned in the Scripture about the secrets of the Creation on the other. The former were intended to reform and cultivate human beings, and prepare them for the best of their life. In contrast, the latter were mentioned as a manifestation of the divine signs of the Creation, which indicate the divine oneness, mercy and power. The latter category, Riḍā argued, is not used by scientists and historians in their methods of scientific research. Allah, on the contrary, let human beings use their own capabilities to reach specific scientific conclusions through research without depending on the divine revelation. And yet if there were any accurate scholarly conclusion, which might not be agreeable with the literal meaning of the Qurʾān, the subjects in question should be interpreted in the light of the concept of Taʿwil.

In his concluding remarks, Riḍā stressed that one of the characteristics of the Qurʾān was that there is no qaṭʿī (definite) passage which can be violated by definite logical and scientific proofs. The People of the Book, on the contrary, never hold such a claim with regard to their Scripture. Indignantly criticising Muslim doubters, Riḍā expounded that ignorance of the Qurʾān in both spiritual and social matters had dominated some Muslim minds, though the Qurʾān in fact is agreeable to logic and science: ‘unlike many Westerners who were ready to raise funds for the spread of their religion, despite the contradictions their Scriptures contain,’ Riḍā said.⁴⁴

7.6. An Egyptian Debater in Gairdner’s Magazine

Due to his polemical writings against missionary attacks, a certain ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Nuṣḥī ʿAbd al-Majīd was known to the readers of al-Manār in the late 1920s. Very little is known about him, but he always signed his contributions to Riḍā’s journal as ‘a warden of the storeroom of the Royal Agricultural Cooperative Society in the city of Ashmūn’ (Northern Egypt). In al-Manār we read that he wrote a treatise entitled: al-Qawl al-Ṣaḥīḥ fī Tarjamat Muḥammad wā al-Masīḥ (The True Statement concerning the Biographies of Muḥammad and Jesus), which was also available for two Egyptian piasters in al-Manār Bookshop in Cairo. The treatise was a brief summary of the histories of both prophets. Riḍā showed his appreciation to Nuṣḥī’s small work, describing it as: ‘nicely written and well-styled in its discussion on the authors of the Gospels.’

⁴³ Ibid., pp. 105-106.
⁴⁴ Ibid., p. 106.

During my further research, it appeared that Nuṣḥī had a correspondence with the above-mentioned missionary periodical al-Sharq wā al-Gharb of Temple Gairdner. In June 1923, for instance, he asked the editorial board of the magazine to explain the genealogy of Moses and that of Jesus from the side of their mothers. Nuṣḥī’s tone reflected the challenge of a Muslim reader who tried to cast doubts on Biblical narratives. Later in March 1924, he raised two more questions, firstly in relation to the concept of polygamy in the Bible; and secondly whether there was any obvious statement in the Bible prohibiting slavery. It was apparent that Nuṣḥī’s aim was to oblige the missionary magazine to give an implicit refutation of its own allegations on Islam regarding these points, which they also used in their critique of Islam.

Nuṣḥī also turned to Riḍā with a query (1928) on the concept of Original Sin in Christianity. He mentioned that he had had regular gatherings with Christian missionaries in his hometown. Once he had discussed the matters of the Original Sin and the Crucifixion with a missionary, who adamantly challenged him as a Muslim that those who did not believe in Jesus as the saviour would continue to carry this sin. ‘Without shedding blood,’ the missionary went on, ‘one’s sins would never be forgiven. Muslims themselves sacrifice [animals] on behalf of themselves, including the Prophet who himself

---

45 Al-Manār, vol. 29/5, p. 400.
46 See, al-Sharq wā al-Gharb, vol. 19/7 (July 1923), pp. 212-214.
47 Ibid., pp. 212-214 In their answer, the editors of the magazine referred Nuṣḥī to the Biblical passages on the genealogy of Moses in Exodus (6:16-20), and to that of Jesus in Mathew (1:1) and Luke (3:23). The magazine added that, as he was concerned with availing the Jews with his writings, Mathew intended to prove that Jesus had the full right to be called ‘the offspring of David.’ And as he wrote his Gospel for the ‘nations,’ Luke’s intention was to prove the progeny of Jesus from David from the side of his mother.
48 Al-Sharq wā al-Gharb, vol. 20/3 (March 1924), p. 86.
offered sacrifice.’ Nuṣḥī asked Riḍā how true the missionary claim was about Adam’s Sin as attached to his offspring.\footnote{Naẓariyyat al-Naṣārā fī Khattī’at ʿĀdam (The View of Christians concerning the Sin of Adam), al-Manār, vol. 29/2, pp. 100-104.}

In his answer, Riḍā articulated many elements of his anti-missionary polemics mentioned above. He repeated that the ‘missionary enterprise is a part of the Western penetration in Eastern lands.’\footnote{Al-Manār, vol. 29/2, op. cit., p. 102} He quoted again Lord Salisbury’s statement that ‘missionary schools are the first step towards colonialism […] that they cast strife and animosity among the inhabitants of the one country.’\footnote{Ibid.} Riḍā warned people like Nuṣḥī neither to read missionary literature, nor to waste their time in debating with them. He stated that those missionaries—except a few—were ‘soldiers hired to carry out mischief on earth.’\footnote{Ibid.} He harshly attacked the Christian concepts of Salvation and Trinity as ‘ancient pagan creeds,’ referring to the work of Tannīr. Again, he praised the ‘independent’ Western Christian intellectuals, who rejected these doctrines.\footnote{Al-Manār, vol. 29/2, op. cit., p. 103} In conclusion, Riḍā totally rejected that offering animals as sacrifice was prescribed in Islam as a ‘pagan practice,’ like in other religions. It was only stipulated in order that a Muslim would show his gratitude to God in his sharing with other poor fellow-Muslims in the society.\footnote{Ibid., p. 104.}

7.7. A Muslim Facing Missionaries in Tunisia

On a similar level, a certain ʿUmar Khūja from Tunisia became confused about some theological issues due to his debates with Protestant missionaries in his region.\footnote{Al-Manār, vol. 28/10 (Rajab 1346/January 1928), pp. 747-757.} One of the issues they dealt with was the creation of the universe and the explanation of the cosmic structure in light of the Qur’ān, such as in the verse: ‘Allah is He Who created seven Firmaments, and of the Earth similar ones’ (Al-Talāq, 65:12). It was difficult for Khūja to understand that the heavens were spanned out as seven layers in the context of modern scientific discoveries. The second problem in the Tunisian petitioner’s mind was the status and place of Jesus after death. If it were really true that he was still living on ‘earth,’ how could he get food or drink? But if he survived in the heaven, where would he descend at the end of time? What about the Muslim who did not believe in his present survival in Heaven?

Riḍâ mentioned that there were several Qur’anic verses speaking about the creation of heavens and earth. The word arḍ (earth) was always found in the singular form, except in the verse quoted by the petitioner. Riḍâ described it as mutashâbih (ambiguous). He considered all interpretations of the verse describing the length or breadth of the heavens as unreliable because they were based on the lore of Isrâ‘ilîyyât. Riḍâ referred to the Ḥadîths related by Ibn ‘Abbâs, ‘Ā‘îsha and ‘Abû Hurairah in this regard as indefinite and not marfû‘, which means a Ḥadîth effectively elevated to the Prophet. As for the second point, Riḍâ contended that there was no qaṭ‘î (definitive) tradition which indicated that Jesus had been lifted to Heaven and was still alive with his soul and body.56 As for the verse: ‘O Jesus! I will take thee and raise thee to Myself (Al-Imrân: 3:55), Riḍâ was more inclined to accept the interpretation of Ibn ‘Abbâs that God made him really die. He rejected the commentary of Wahb Ibn Munabbih (b. 34 AH/654-5 AD) that ‘God had made him die three hours at the beginning of the day after which he was lifted to Heaven.’ The reason for his rejection was that such interpretations contradicted the apparent meaning (dhâhir) of the verse, along with the role of Ibn Munabbih in disseminating Israelite tales, which Riḍâ totally denounced.57

The same held true for the return of Jesus before the Day of Resurrection, which we have already discussed in the first of the fatwâs selected in the chapter. This notion was, in Riḍâ’s evaluation, the basis on which the Christian belief lies, but it had no foundation in Islam. Riḍâ also doubted the Traditions indicating that Jesus’ descent before the end of the world will be on to the white arcade of the Eastern gate at Damascus, or on to a hill in the Holy Land with a spear in his hand to kill the Dajjâl (Antichrist). He highlighted that most of the Traditions on the second return of Jesus were narrated in the context of the ‘aḥâd traditions on ‘Alamât al-Sâ‘ah (Signs of the Hour), on which one should not depend in matters of belief.58 The belief of Jesus’ being alive in Heaven, Riḍâ added, was no part of the fundamentals of the Islamic creed. Therefore, if a Muslim rejected it, he would be no apostate. But he was hesitant to leave his statement open, and stipulated that if a Muslim reached the conclusion after his investigation that the Prophetic Traditions in this respect were to be regarded as sound, he must believe in the return of Jesus on the basis of them. His doubt of the Prophet’s sayings in that case, Riḍā asserted, might lead to apostasy. In other words, there was no harm in his refusing or accepting his return on the basis of what he believed to be ḥanunī (subjective) traditions. The Muslim should rather maintain the Prophet’s sayings as trustworthy, and leave all other details to God. At the end, Riḍā summarised:

56 Ibid., pp. 753-54.
57 Ibid, p. 754.
58 Ibid, p. 756.

A Muslim should not cling to such traditions, since they were no article of the Islamic faith. It is also no harm for one’s doctrine to suspect their authenticity […]. What could really harm him is his scepticism or rejection of these traditions after having recognised their authenticity […]. In this case he is discrediting the Prophet […] by thinking of his erroneousness in delivering God’s revelation.⁵⁹

7.8. Fatherless Birth of Jesus: non-Qur’ānic?

In the early 1930s, a student in Indonesia wrote a long article in which he denied the virgin birth of Jesus. He argued that the matter was totally in contradiction with the Qur’ānic verses which stressed that there would never be tabdīl (change) or taḥwīl (turning off) in God’s order or system of the universal laws (al-ʾAḥzāb, 62 & Fāṭir 43). The editors of the magazine challenged those who believed in the fatherless miraculous birth of Jesus to bring Qur’ānic verses or authentic Prophetic Traditions which would prove the contrary. The above-mentioned Basyūnī ʿImrán of Java (see, chapter 1) brought the issue to al-Manār to say its word, since he was persuaded that its commentary on the relevant verses could put an end to this controversy. Riḍā briefly elaborated on the issue by saying that Muslim scholars on the basis of many Qur’ānic verses have unanimously agreed on the fatherless birth of Jesus. If anyone denied its truth, he harshly concluded, he should be deemed to be an unbeliever.⁶⁰

⁵⁹ ibid., p. 757.
⁶⁰ Al-Manār, vol. 32/9 (Jumāda al-ʿĀkhira 1351/October 1932), pp. 671-672.
7.9. Missionary Doubts on Qurʾānic Narratives

A certain ‘Alī al-Jundī, a teacher at al-Nāṣiryya School in Cairo, had religious debates with Christian missionaries, who had raised doubts on some Qurʾānic narratives. He eagerly requested Riḍā for his clarifications on such ‘allegations’ in order that he could sustain his arguments with solid arguments. The first point focused on the Hawāriyyūn (disciples) of Jesus, who were constantly praised in various places in the Qurʾān, but were also mentioned in the Christian Scriptures as believing in the Trinity and Crucifixion. Al-Jundī was also confused that some Christians portrayed some figures in the Qurʾānic tales as being Christians. The Qurʾān, for instance, described Aḥl Al-Kahf (the People of the Cave) as monotheists, but they had existed 250 years after Jesus. This might suggest that they had believed in a ‘corrupted’ Christianity. Al-Jundī once read that the Jesuit scholar L. Cheikho had argued that the people of the Cave were believers in ‘the Cross.’ The commentators of the Qurʾān explained the story of Aḥl al-Qarya (the People of the Village) as a tale about the disciples of Jesus, including Paul. Fourthly, the questioner had many ‘moderate’ Christian friends who believed in Jesus as a prophet and saw Islam as a ‘true’ religion, but still believed in the Crucifixion. They argued that the story had been mentioned by the Jews and witnessed by contemporary people and scribes. What were the differences between the Jewish and Christian Scriptures? Were the Jews closer to Muslims in monotheism than the Christians? If so, what was the reason for their ‘inherited’ hostility to Muslims as related in the Qurʾān? Were there any Christian religious men other than Barnabas who had propagated pure monotheism and rejected the Crucifixion? Did such people also exist after the message of the prophet Muḥammad? Could Muslims rest assured that Islam would win over Christianity, even though Christian missionaries were more vigorous in propagating their religion?

In the beginning, Riḍā explained that there was no mention of the names or genealogy of Jesus’ disciples in the Qurʾān. But the Christian Scriptures narrated that they were twelve. He argued that it was only John who described them as believing in the Trinity. He saw that 61 Vol. 33/7 (Shaʿbān 1352/November 1933), pp. 507-512.

---

62 Yāsīn, 36: 13-32.
there were discrepancies among the four Gospels concerning the story of the Crucifixion. Riḍā demanded that his questioner should not base his belief entirely in the narratives mentioned in the works of Tafsīr regarding the People of the Cave. He also accused Cheikho that as a Jesuit he had either based his story on such ‘invented’ Israelite tales, or had made it up himself. He confirmed that Jesus had been sent to preach monotheism. All Muslim commentators maintained that the People of the Cave were not Christians, except Ibn Kathīr (d. 1373) who attributed to them the religion of Jesus. However, Riḍā believed that they had existed a long time before Christianity. He rejected that they had been Christians, who believed in the Cross. Riḍā’s only proof was that such a claim would have contradicted the Qur’ān, which he deemed impossible.63

The same held true for the Prophetic Traditions of the story of the People of the Village. They were related by the converted Jews Kaḇ al-Aḥbār and Wahb Ibn Munabbih, who disseminated most of these ‘mythical’ tales on the authority of Ibn Abbās. Riḍā depended on Ibn Kathir’s view, who interpreted that the People of the Village as messengers sent by God and not by Jesus.64

Regarding the Christians who firmly believed in the Crucifixion and accepted Islam as true, Riḍā explicated that the Qur’ānic verse negating Jesus as having been slain (al-Nisā’, 3:157) did not indicate the rejection of the story completely, but rebuffed his death in the way explained by Christian Scriptures. Riḍā was less clear in judging those Christians than his above-mentioned fatwās on those who searched for the truth. One would also expect Riḍā to repeat his interpretations of the Crucifixion as ‘illusive,’ which he had uttered earlier in his aforementioned treatise in 1913 (see, chapter 6). After twenty years, he now put emphasis in this fatwā on his conviction that the story of the Crucifixion was not reliable, and there was no consensus among the early Christians about it.65

Riḍā admitted that the concept of the Messiah according to the Torah was a complex issue. He only repeated his point mentioned in the first fatwā that the Jews believed in the Messiah as a coming king who would revive the kingdom of Solomon, but not as a prophet.

---

63 Ibid., pp. 508-09.
64 Ibid., pp. 510-11.
65 Ibid., p. 511.
For him, the Christians considered his coming kingdom as a spiritual one, while the Jews would expect it as a political and financial one. Riḍā explained the verse regarding the animosity of the Jews and the friendship of the Christians as revealed in the case of the Jews of Ḥijāz and the Christians of Abyssinia in particular. It should not be understood as part of the realm of the Islamic belief. He also rejected the view that the animosity between Jews and Muslims was intrinsic. He insisted that it was the Jews who had first shown animosity against Muslims, especially in Palestine. In the same sense, Christians had also founded their hostility with Islam in the form of the Crusades in the past and the continuation of European colonialism and Christian missions in the present. Without colonialism and missionary activities, he went on, Christians would have been much closer to Muslims than Jews. However, he explained that the conflict between Muslims and Western Christians would result in many advantages for Muslims, viz. that all Western nations would one day convert to Islam.66

7.10. Miḥrāb and Altar

In 1932, Riḍā received a question concerning the miḥrāb (niche) in the mosque and its similarity with the altar in the church.67 The questioner cited the Ḥadīth where the Prophet was reported to have said: ‘My nation remains in a good status as far as they do not turn their mosques into altars like the Christians.’

Riḍā maintained that the miḥrāb was embedded in the qibla (direction of prayer) wall for the practical reason that the imam would not occupy a whole row in the mosque. The niche of the Christians and Jews known as altar was a shrine and place for worship. The altar was known in ancient religions as the place where men used to give their offerings to God. He cited the Old Testament ‘And Noah built an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar’ (Genesis, 8:20). Stories about the altar of burnt offering and that of incense are also mentioned in details in the chapter of Exodus. Riḍā issued the fatwā in the period when he had intense conflict with Nūr al-Islām, the mouthpiece of Al-Azhar at that time (see, chapter 3). He suspected the authenticity of the Hadith quoted by the questioner, accusing Al-Azhar scholars of propagating such doubtful narratives in their magazine.

66 Ibid., pp. 512-13.
67 Al-Manār, vol. 32/4 (Dhū al-Ḥijja 1350/April 1932), p. 268.

7.11. Don’t Recite the Qurʾānic Verses on Christians in Public!

In chapter three, we have seen that Riḍā’s views on allowing Muslim children to attend Christian schools had led to a rigorous dispute with Al-Azhar scholars in the early 1930s. In 1934, he had another dispute with a regional scholar under the name of Sheikh Maḥmūd Maḥmūd, the deputy of Ḥamīyyat Makārim al-ʾAkhlaq (Society of Best Moralities) and a high school teacher in Cairo. The society was situated in Shubrā, at the outskirts of Cairo. Upon his arrival in Egypt, Riḍā became an active member of the society, where he used to deliver many lectures. One of the main objectives of this society was to combat missionary organisations in the neighbourhood. It had its own primary school and printing house. Besides this it published two magazines, one was named after the society, and the other bore the name al-Muṣliḥ (The Reformer).

According to the Cairine newspaper al-Waṭaniyya, Sheikh Maḥmūd maintained that broadcasting Qurʾānic recitations on the radio should be stopped. He argued that the Qurʾān contains certain verses opposing the People of the Book. The reasons for their revelation were not existent anymore. ‘Since the People of the Book have become under our protection (Dhawī Dhimmatina),’ Maḥmūd argued, ‘their feelings should not be hurt any longer by letting them listen to such verses.’ He further explained that he himself hated Surat Yūsuf being recited inside Muslim houses because he worried that women would suspect Yūsuf’s chastity, when they regularly listen... to the story. Also people, according to Mahmūd, should not recite the Qurʾān in public in case they did not grasp its inner meanings.

Ayyūb Ṣabrī, the editor of al-Waṭaniyya, referred the question to Riḍā, requesting him to deal with the issue as soon as possible. 71 Riḍā did not hesitate to express his total rejection of Maḥmūd’s fatwā. In his primary answer, Riḍā preferred in the beginning not to mention the name of the mufti, hoping that he would recant his opinion or would send a clarification to al-Manār. He strongly declared that the Qurʾān as ‘the true word of God’ must be propagated and any concealment of its verses was sin; any acceptance of this sin as lawful would lead to infidelity.72

Two years earlier, we read in al-Manār that Riḍā highly commended Maḥmūd because of ‘his religious knowledge and enthusiasm.’ 73 But his religious views in this regard turned this enthusiasm into total frustration. Riḍā attempted to convince his readers that there was no difference between ‘knowledgeable’ or ‘ignorant’ reciters of the Qurʾān in public occasions. All Qurʾānic verses speaking about the People of the Book negatively or positively were suitable to each age and place. Riḍā asserted forcefully that there were many among the People of the Book in the modern age, who were more hostile to Islam than those contemporary with the time of revelation. He saw that Maḥmūd’s attempt of ‘abrogating’ these verses was only to satisfy the Christians and Jews, giving them priority above the Qurʾān.

Five months later, Riḍā mentioned the name of the person, who issued the fatwa. Having read al-Manār, Sheikh Maḥmūd started to defend his point of view. The discussion quickly turned into a hot polemical attack on Riḍā’s character as a scholar. In his commentary on the Qurʾānic verse: ‘Revile not ye those whom they call upon beside Allah, lest they out of spite revile Allah in their ignorance’ (Al-Anʿām, 6:108), Maḥmūd concluded that Muslims were prohibited from insulting the ‘gods of the Christians.’ 74 He intensified his assault upon Riḍā by saying that the Qurʾān was dearer and more beloved to him than the founder of al-Manār. He depicted Riḍā as having grown old and his memory became weak. He had also started to forget what he himself said in his Tafsīr regarding the same verse. 75 He reminded 71 ibid., pp. 33-38.

---

72 Ibid.
73 Al-Manār, vol. 32/8 (Jumādā al-Ūlā 1351/September 1932), p. 634.
74 As quoted in, al-Manār, vol. 34/5, p. 383.
75 Ibid.
Ridā of what he had already stated years ago in his commentary on the verse that it was forbidden to call the dhimmīs ‘unbelievers’ if it would lead to hurting them.\(^{76}\) He also concluded that any abuse of the gods or saints of the Christians on radio should be forbidden, especially when Muslims were divided, humiliated and weakened while the unbelievers were more strong and unified. Muslims should especially avoid this when it also leads to the disintegration and ruin of the umma.\(^{77}\)

Ridā contested the fatwā by cynically maintaining that he held higher esteem for the Qurʾān than the mufti of Makārim al-Akhlāq. He was deeply disappointed by Maḥmūd’s remarks on his ‘weak memory’ and ‘old age.’ He counterattacked by saying that due to his ‘young age’ Maḥmūd was not able to understand al-Manār’s views. He moreover argued that the Qurʾānic verses on Christians contained no offending passages for their gods, cross or saints. The Qurʾān on the contrary recommended cooperation and concord with them. In the end, Ridā promised to put an end to the conflict if Maḥmūd would discontinue publishing his ‘absurdity’ on the Qurʾān.\(^{78}\)

7.12. A Muslim Copyist of Missionary Books and Crafting the Cross for Christians

In 1930, Ridā issued an interesting fatwā concerning a Muslim calligrapher, who was hired by Christian missionaries in Algeria to copy their books.\(^{79}\) Ridā considered that any assistance to missionaries by reproducing such ‘repulsive’ books would lead to participating in spreading ‘infidelity.’ Those ‘geographical Muslims’ should be called back to repent from earning money through ways of infidelity and enmity of God and the Prophet. To continue working with missionary institutions leads to apostasy. His Muslim fellows should not give their daughters to him in marriage, nor should they bury him according to Muslim rites. Ridā urged that if there were a Sharʾī court in \(^{76}\) Tafsīr al-Manār, vol. 7, p. 550. Ridā published this view for the first time in the first issue of al-Manār in February 1898. See, vol. 1/1 (Shawwāl 1315/February 1898), p. 17.

---

\(^{77}\) Al-Manār, vol. 34/5, p. 383.

\(^{78}\) Ibid.

\(^{79}\) Al-Manār, vol. 31/4, p. 276.
the province, a case of apostasy must be brought against him in order to separate him from his Muslim wife.

Riḍā’s last fatwā (July 1935), a few months before his death, came as an answer to a similar petition by a certain Muḥammad Maṣūr Najāṭī from Damascus, whose craft was probably printing, on the religious ruling concerning printing books of other religions and engraving the cross on copper, zinc and on covers of those books. In the same line of his previous fatwā, Riḍā deemed printing or giving any assistance to print or propagate ‘false’ books as totally forbidden. This work might lead to infidelity in the case of the printer’s admitting its contents were accurate. In Riḍā’s view, the cross was a symbol of a non-Muslim religion; and Muslims should not help its followers to spread it. However, nobody should protest against the freedom of the Christians to display it in the Territory of Islam. To engrave it on metals for commercial reasons was not considered sinful as far as there existed no verification for belief in the heart of the Muslim doing so.

7.13. Conclusion

The chapter has proved that Riḍā’s fatwās are a useful reference in tracing his theological and polemical views on Christianity. The questions raised in these fatwās were diverse. This medley of fatwās echoed synopses of some of the major elements of Riḍā’s analysis of Christological doctrines, such as the Trinity and the Original Sin, from an Islamic point of view. The questions show a significant dimension of the Muslim encounter with missionary attacks on Islam in various regions at the micro-level. These questions not only related to the theological challenges to Islam put forward in missionary writings, but were also connected with social problems, such as the question of slavery in Kuwait and to the petitions of Muslim copyists and printers of missionary works in Algeria.

Riḍā’s fatwās for Alfred Nielsen were unique. It has been noted that both sides were ready to come close to each other, each trying their best to show the merits of their own belief. As religious men, both Riḍā and Nielsen were keen on giving their views on several subjects. The discussions not only reflect an Islamic view on missions,

---

80 Al-Manār, vol. 35/2 (Rabī’ al-Akhar 1354/July 1935), pp. 134-35.
but clearly represent Nielsen’s understanding, as a missionary, of Islam as well. Nielsen’s questions took the form of a missionary challenge to Islam. He attempted to probe the Muslim perception of missions through Riḍā’s views. Nielsen’s questions also reflected a strand of self-critical liberal Christian thought which many conservative Christian thinkers, at that time and still today, would have found objectionable: the idea that doubt—grappling with one’s faith rather than accepting it without thought—is necessary for faith, for a Christian’s faith as well as for a Muslim’s.
