The Fate of the Roman Law in the Eastern Europe since the Death of Justinian the Great until the Fall of the Byzantine Empire

Karol Ryszkowski

Abstract: To maintain the unity of the state and the legal order, Justinian banned the writing of abstracts, excerpts and interpretations of his codification. Justinian’s bans were subject to high penalties; however, they were already violated during his lifetime, which contributed to the development of legal thought. The durability of Justinian’s codification, as evidenced by long period of validity, was only apparent, because the Justinian law was only in force in later periods theoretically and in the form of extracts from extracts, including the Eclogue, Basilika, Novels of Leo VI, Procheiron and Epanagoge. The Eastern Church had far-reaching privileges under the imperial law, so it made sure that it was not lost by the desuetude. To this end, separate sets of provisions were created, whether included only in the imperial constitutions or provisions contained in all Justinian legislation. In the 7th Century, these collections combined collections of the Byzantine emperors – translated into the Old Russian by the state law for the Church with the provisions of the church legislation – canons (nomocanons). The apparatus of power in Byzantium deviated from its Roman standards. An important thread in the development of the Roman law in the Eastern Europe was its didactics. In the beginning, the problem was to eliminate scientific centres in Athens and Alexandria, which were opposing the Justinian codification. The consequence of the collapse of schools in Byzantium was the collapse of scientific development of the Roman-Byzantine law in the Eastern Europe. The lack of schools that could deal with the development of

Introduction

The history of the Roman law after the death of the emperor Justinian the Great has a significant significance for the history of the East and in the application of realities for the nowadays uniting Europe (potential accession to the European Union, some countries of the Balkan Peninsula). The significance of the fate of the Roman law in the Eastern territories is important for determining the text of the Justinian included and for learning about the Justinian law. The importance of the Roman rights in Byzantium is emphasized by the fact that the influence on the West is derived, which shows that it is the influence of the Roman law by the Ravenna Exarchate and Rome, which after the conquest of the Lombards remained with the Eastern Empire, and during all of the southern Italy. In this paper, we will show the above-mentioned significance and its meaning for the future of the European legislation.

1 Justinian’s prohibitions and violations during his life

Justinian’s codification stimulated the cultivation of the Roman law in a scientific way that was necessary to adapt it to the Eastern realities. Justinian wanted to exert a great influence on keeping his codification in pure form, so it was forbidden to write to his collections of answers and use when rewriting the Digest. All this served to eliminate possible ambiguities and any interpretation of the collection. The emperor was worried that the professors would change the law. He wanted to get any price related to the situation in which it would be possible to circumvent or to break the applicable law.\textsuperscript{4} To maintain the durability of the system demanding uniform and universal law in the area of exceptional non-legal decisions, because it is precisely this that does not creep into freedom and load within borders.\textsuperscript{5} Justinian wanted once and for all to create and to use a state of uncertainty in calculations that could apply to the next scholar procedure.\textsuperscript{6}

The ban on writing comments to the Justinian’s collections found itself against critics and any explanations – \textit{legum interpretationes, immo magis perversiones}.\textsuperscript{7} The punishment for breaking the ban was deportation, confiscation of all property and destruction of the work that violated the ban. Only literal translations of the collections into the Greek (the so-called \textit{Kata poda}),\textsuperscript{8} special places (the so-called \textit{Paratitla}) and short summaries to some passages (the so-called \textit{Incides} or \textit{Summae})\textsuperscript{9} were allowed.

Justinian’s bans were not meticulously monitored by scholars. Scholars made available free text translations. The same restrictions put forward by Justinian were not applied, because there were no restrictions on school lectures, which, however, expanded in the form of scripts. Even in Justinian’s time, paraphrases in the Greek were created, which transferred the text and explanatory notes (the so-called \textit{Paragraphai}) to the \textit{Digest} and the \textit{Code}.\textsuperscript{10}

The flagship configuration of breaking Justinian’s bans is the Greek paraphrase of the Institutes (Paraphrasis Institutionum Graeca), attributed to the later required marshal of the court, professor Theophilo (Theophilus), who was co-editor of the Institutes (member of the Justinian’s codification committee). It is available in the form of a free translation of the Justinian Institutes, kept in the form of a lecture. Professor Theophilo himself was associated with a school in Constantinople.

During Justinian’s lifetime, translations of the Digest by lawyer Stephanus and the Code comments from Thaleleus were created. The rank of Theophilo’s paraphrase, however, is emphasized by the fact that it constituted a subsequent codification of the Greek law.

2 Development of legislation after the death of Justinian

a) Introductory remarks

The further fate of the Justinian’s codification in the Eastern Empire, on the one hand, shows the durability of the work and, on the other hand, the need for its simplification. The durability of the codification is evidenced by the fact of the commitment binding it until the fall of the Eastern Empire in year 1453. The popularization of the work among the Greek-speaking people was associated with its simplification.

After Justinian’s death, codification is still subject to binding; major political changes as well as technical and linguistic difficulties caused

\textbf{b) Eclogue and progressive integration of the Syrian dynasty}

Application found the \textit{Justinian} collections only in the judicial practice of Byzantium.\textsuperscript{20}

At the beginning of the 8\textsuperscript{th} Century, a Greek extract from the \textit{Justinian} codification, the so-called \textit{Eclogue}\textsuperscript{21} (\textit{Ekloge ton nomon}, choice of laws), was made at the behest of the emperor \textit{Leo III of the Isaurian dynasty} (years 717 – 741). \textit{Eclogue} was announced in year 726.\textsuperscript{22} It was associated with the emperor’s tendency to create the Byzantine collections based on \textit{Justinian} modification. \textit{Eclogue} included civil law and criminal law for practical purposes and took into account customary law. It reflected greater Christian influence, and most importantly, contributed to the humanization of the Byzantine law.\textsuperscript{23} The word “\textit{ekloge}” literally means “choice”, “excerpt”. The role played by \textit{Eclogue} is emphasized by the fact that it was widespread not only in Byzantium, but also in the Slavic countries.\textsuperscript{24}

\textit{Leo III}’s choice of rights was an attempt to impose a uniform legal order on his citizens.\textsuperscript{25} During the Syrian dynasty, the idea of basing the state organization on uniform legislation was taken from the \textit{Justinian} ideas. However, the rulers of the Syrian dynasty changed the meaning of legal regulations from the time of \textit{Justinian} significantly. The legislative activity of Leo III compared to the legislation of Justinian the Great is characterized by greater progress. Leo III’s legislation draws the idea of equality for all Christian citizens under the law and of prohibition of contempt for the lower classes. There is no room for tolerance for crimes of powerful people. Slavery standards were removed. An important change in the legislation of Leo III was the limitation of the scope of paternal power. Forced obligations of peasants were reduced, church property was taxed. Equal rights have been granted to spouses. Compliance with legal standards was to be supervised by a professional and secure judiciary. The scope of state crimes against the Justinian norms has expanded, encompassing not only the insult to majesty, but also any violation of the whole of the state. This was to ensure the permanence of the state.

Eclogue has introduced many new rules. Since then, the Roman law has been giving way in the East to the Greek-Roman (Roman-Byzantine) law, which deviates significantly from the Justinian’s codification in the inheritance and the family law department. This term was introduced by Karl Eduard Zachariä von Lingenthal to describe the Roman law, which was codified in the Byzantine Empire and in particular in Switzerland or Greece.

At the time of Leo III, the Book of the Prefect (Eparch) was also created, which included regulation of the system of craft guilds. It is believed that at the time of the above-mentioned emperor also three small codification works originated: Nomos Rhodon Nautikos (sea law of Rhodes), Nomos Georgikos (agrarian law) and Nomos Stratiotikos (military law). Nomos Rhodon Nautikos is significantly different from the norms contained in the Justinian codification, which irretrievably lost their power in the face of the collapse of the Byzantine sailing. The Maritime Code was based on customary law. The very name of Nomos Rhodion Nautikos may suggest the influences of the Greek law. The former capital of the island of Rhodes – the city of Lindos is considered the place of creation of the maritime law, which was adopted in the Mediterranean Basin in the ancient times. From all of these three codes, Nomos Georgikos raises the most controversy. The date of its origin as well as the local jurisdiction is doubtful. There is a concept that this code was only valid in areas inhabited by the Slavs. The source of disputes is the fact that the said code probably only regulated the relations of free peasant communes and made no mention of peasant serfdom.\(^\text{32}\)

c) The Macedonian dynasty: Basilika, Novels of Leo VI, Procheiron and Epanagoge

During the Macedonian dynasty, the progressive legislation of the Syrian dynasty was liquidated. The work that completely implemented the tendency to create a fully Greek study of the Justinian collections was Basilika (Basilica, royal statutes), constituting a restitution of the Justinian law for the needs of the church and feudal system.\(^\text{33}\) This work was announced in the 9th Century. The whole consisted of sixty books (hence the term Hexabiblos), which contained the development and alteration of the Digest, the Code and the Justinian’s Novels, supplemented by numerous imperial novels and commentaries (scholia). The presence of comments and alterations is justified by the fact that Basilika has already repeated largely outdated material legal, which gave rise to the need for updating. The development of Basilika began during the reign of Basil I the Macedonian and was completed during the reign of his successor, Leo VI the Philosopher (years 866 – 911).\(^\text{34}\) Basilika was the most extensive collection of the medieval Byzantine laws. A commission chaired by the Protopsaltarios Symbatios took care of the work.\(^\text{35}\)

Basilika covered private law, public law and canon law. Most of the recipes were taken from the Justinian Code and the Digest. To a lesser extent, Basilika was also based on the Justinian’s Novels, Institutes as well as

Justin II’s and Tiberius’s Novell and Procheiron. The Code paraphrase included in the study was authored by Justinian professor Thalelaios. An anonymous Digest paraphrase was also included in the work.³⁶

When compiling Basilika, lawyers of Basil I and Leo VI did not reach for the Latin sources, basing their work on the Greek translations and the Greek commentary dated from the 6th and 7th Centuries. Basilika was distinguished by the transparency of the system, which, combined with the editors in the Greek, decided about its superiority over the codification of Justinian for the citizens of Byzantium. In the introduction of Basilika, attention was drawn to the chaotic nature of Justinian’s work. All this contributed to the repression of the Justinian codification in the Eastern Empire and the promotion of Basilika to the rank of basic legal knowledge in Byzantium.³⁷

Over the centuries, the text of Basilika was supplemented by numerous scholars. In the 12th Century, it was the so-called Tipucitus – the Index that Basilika was supplied with. Tipucitus as term came from the Greek phrase “ti pu ketai”, meaning “where is what”.³⁸ During the time of the emperor – lawyer, Constantine VII Flavius Porphyrogenitus (years 913 – 959), Epitome Basilika was created. An abridged elaboration of the text of Basilika was also prepared.³⁹

Leo VI issued 113 edicts named after the Justinian works Novels (proper titled hai ton nomon epanorthotikai anakatharseis, which means “correcting and purifying old laws”). Novels modified old laws and removed some of them; they also contained matter that was not covered by customary law. The addressee of ordinances concerning the affairs of the Church was Patriarch Stephen, of the other ordinances Stylianos Zaoutzes.⁴⁰

Basil I also started legislative work in order to prepare an accessible textbook of applicable law. The study was entitled Procheiron (ho procheiros nomos)⁴¹ and was announced during the reign of his son, Leo VI, in year 879.⁴² The work was published on behalf of the emperors Basil, Constantine and Leo. According to the creators, this work was to be adapted to practical use. The most important and most frequently used civil and public law provisions are listed in 40 paragraphs. From all the parts of the Justinian codification, Procheiron draws the most from Institutes. When editing the textbook, just like when editing Basilika, mainly the Greek translations and Justinian codification comments were used, rather than referring to the original editorial rights. Procheiron also contains many borrowings from the popular Leo III’s Eclogue, although Basil denied all communications with the codification of the emperor – iconoclast. Procheiron, as before Eclogue, was translated into the Slavic language and also enjoyed great popularity among the Southern and the Eastern Slavs.⁴³

In year 879, Epanagoge was to appear – an introduction to the great set of laws, published on behalf of the emperors Basil, Leo and Alexander. In Epanagoge we can find the significance of larger borrowings from Eclogue than in Procheiron, because they also apply to marital law, the editing of which was in the case of Procheiron based on the Justinian Code. A special place is in Epanagoge occupied by regulation of rights and obligations of the emperor and patriarch, who were presented here as leaders of the Christian world, cooperating for the good of humanity and heading the state. The work reflects the concept professed by the orthodox circles of the Greek clergy, which presents a perfect picture of cooperation between the state and the Church. This concept was probably transposed into Epanagoge by Photios, who, at that time, was once again the Patriarch. The theory of two authorities, attributed to Photios, emphasized clear separation of the emperor’s and the patriarch’s powers and duties, assigning the emperor the care for temporal goods, while the patriarch the concern for spiritual goods of his subjects. Epanagoge also

3 The Eastern Church and the Byzantine law

The Byzantine law was transplanted to Rus through the clergy of Ruthenia (dependent on the patriarch of Constantinople), which included a large number of the Greeks.45

It is true that many very interesting provisions of both the Russian and the Byzantine laws contained four trade treaties, the so-called Dogowory, concluded between the Ruthenian princes and the Byzantine emperors; however, this is not the direct topic of our paper. These provisions concern private law (including inheritance), criminal law and procedural law. Noteworthy are some provisions that would now be classified as provisions in the field of international private law, including the treatment of the Russian merchants in Constantinople or the abolition of the cruel rules of coastal law in year 911.46 Their conclusion was caused, however, not by the clergy, but by the threat of Byzantium by the Russian expeditions.47 Now, let us come back to the direct topic of our reflections.

Based on imperial law, the Eastern Church had far-reaching privileges (“the Church obtained landed property and immunities”),48 so it was necessary not to lose them through desuetude. This revealed, among others, by creating separate sets of provisions contained either only in imperial constitutions or in provisions contained in the all Justinian legislation. In the 7th Century, these collections combined collections of the Byzantine emperors – the state law for the Church translated into the Old Russian and the provisions of their church legislation – canons. In this way, nomocanons, widespread in the practice of the church judiciary,

The term nomocanon itself came from the words nomos (secular act) and canon (church act).\(^{49}\)

In the mid-sixth Century, a systematic collection of church law was created in Nomocanon by John Scholasticus. This work was based on synodal legislation and the letters of Saint Basil.\(^{51}\) The most important of nomocanons – Nomocanon of 50 Titles, attributed to John Scholasticus, was based on Justinian’s codification. Its translation into the Old Russian was made by Saint Methodius.\(^{52}\)

In the 9th Century, the most extensive codification of church law was created – Photios’s Collection, attributed to the later patriarch, professor of philosophy from Constantinople.\(^{53}\) Nomocanon of Photios became basis for the development of church law in Ruthenia and the Balkans.\(^{54}\)

Parts of the Novels of Leo VI, concerning matters of the Church, were addressed to Patriarch Stephen.\(^{55}\)

In judicial practice, Nomocanon of 14 Titles from the 7th Century was most often used; since the 13th Century it was called Pilot’s Book (Korm-chaya kniga). Later, Pilot’s Book covered Eclogue and Procheiron. Procheiron itself performed in the Slavic countries under the title Gradski zakon.\(^{56}\)

Hexabiblos (conversion of Gradski zakon), developed by judge Constantine Harmenopoulos in year 1345, enjoyed special longevity and had been in force in Greece until year 1946.57

The place of origin and authorship of another collection from the 9th Century, based on Eclogue regulations – Zakon sudny lyudem, is a lot of controversy. According to some concepts, it was created in Bulgaria and according to others, in the Great Moravian Empire.58

From the above-mentioned it can be concluded that “… older monuments of the Ruthenian law testify to the fact that legal culture in Ruthenia was shaped within the legal concepts of the Roman law, which Ruthenia learned through the Byzantine mediation”.59

4 Reception of the Roman administrative apparatus in the East

The apparatus of power in the East showed differences compared to the Roman models. Former traditional offices of consuls, praetors, and even the senate were only symbols and honorary dignities in Byzantium. These offices had no influence on the management of the state. The main purpose for which traditional offices were maintained was to cultivate the memory of a single state. In fact, the state was headed by the emperor, army and centralized bureaucracy.60

Beginning with the 7th Century, the administrative apparatus developed, which led to a transformation in such a way that it was radically different from the Roman system from which it originated. Leo III’s legislation crowns the historical process that elevated the monarch to the rank of one-man.61

Novels of Leo VI revoke the rights of former city curia and the senate.62

5 Role of schools in the development of the Roman-Byzantine law and the consequences of their liquidation

Considering the fate of the Roman law in Byzantium, it is impossible not to mention the schools of law. The East Roman professors used the exegetical method in their lectures, the literary equivalent of which was gloss characteristic for lawyers of the early Middle-Ages.\(^{63}\)

Justinian the Great allowed lecturing law only to professors of Constantinople, Rome and Berytos (today’s Beirut) – i.e. of three official empire law schools. The choice of these centres was not accidental, because Justinian’s concepts were fully accepted in these centres.\(^{64}\) Critical attitudes for Justinian codification were manifested in Alexandria and Athens, which is why these centres were banned from teaching law.\(^{65}\) “Justinian put particular emphasis on closing the school in Alexandria, where there was a strong opposition to the religious policy of the emperors.”\(^{66}\) In the 9th Century, the law education in Byzantium was in a state of complete decline. This state was attempted in the 11th Century to be changed by the emperor Constantine Monomachos, who for this purpose founded a separate legal school in Constantinople. The school’s achievements were of a secondary importance. There is no proven influence of this school on the flourishing of legal science in the West.\(^{67}\)

The collapse of schools of the Byzantine Empire resulted in the fall of the scientific development of the Roman-Byzantine law in the Eastern Europe. The problem of the lack of schools that could deal with the development of the Roman law also hindered its reception in Russia and the Balkan Peninsula. As mentioned above, the process of reception of the Roman-Byzantine law in the Eastern Europe was associated with the process of the Christianisation of the Slavs. Along with the Christianisation of the Slavs, there was a process of the Slavization of the Roman law, which previously had already changed under the influence of the Greek process. Slavization of the Roman law was solely linguistic and limited to the creation of extracts from extracts. Scientific considerations of a small group of scientists were purely theoretical. An additional difficulty in the reception of the Roman-Byzantine law in the East was the low level of urbanization of these areas as well as the very poor level of economic development, which transferred into the poor development of higher education in these areas (the first university in Moscow was established in year 1755).

Conclusions

The image of the timelessness of the Roman law in the Eastern Europe is the long period of the reign of Hexabiblos – the work of judge Harmenopoulos of Thessalonike. Written in year 1345, numbering six books, Hexabiblos was a summary of Procheiron and gave in a concise form the principles of the Roman law still valid in Byzantium. It survived the collapse of Byzantium by almost 500 years and was spread in the Balkans and in Greece by the Decree of 22nd February 1835, where it lasted until year 1946. Hexabiblos is an example that certain aspects of the Roman law have survived in the Eastern Europe to modern times, which is extremely important in connection with the process of the European law unification. The Roman law can constitute a common legal plane – a bridge between the Eastern and the Western Europe, like Dogowory between the Byzantine emperors and the Ruthenian princes, and the ground for the further European Union laws.
