Social work and COVID-19 pandemic: An action call

Solomon Amadasun
University of Benin, Nigeria

Abstract
The social work profession, more than any other, is most hurt by the rampaging coronavirus (aka, COVID-19) pandemic given the scourge’s pernicious impact on society’s underserved and undervalued populations. More so, the pandemic has undermined the profession’s historical value commitment to social justice and human rights while overturning our insistence on the importance of human relationships. The purpose of this essay is to explicate the nexus between social work and COVID-19 pandemic. While noting the deafening silence of the profession in the global discourse of the pandemic, it advocates for the urgency of our response if our profession is to attain significant public value amid the current loss of lives and threats to human rights. Strategies for our professional action, in flattening the curve of the contagion, are laid out.

Keywords
COVID-19, global pandemic, human relationships, professional action, public health challenge, social work

Unless we expedite action to respond to the world’s major challenges, our profession could continue to be called to question, first, by critics, citizens, and then our client-systems and ultimately ourselves.

(Solomon Amadasun)

Introduction
Although some are in denial (regrettably so, arising from misinformation), the vast majority of humanity is imbued in utter shock and fear as to how a singular event could trigger a complete halt in human affairs. Today, the coronavirus (aka, COVID-19) pandemic – which was first reported in the city of Wuhan in Hubei province of China – has successfully plummeted global economy, disrupted global social events, as well as caused the death of hundreds of thousands of people while

Corresponding author:
Solomon Amadasun, Department of Social Work, Faculty of Social Sciences, University of Benin, Ugbowo Campus (P.M.B 1154), Benin City, Nigeria.
Email: Amadasun.s@yahoo.com leaving millions (at the moment, more than 25 million cases have been confirmed worldwide) infected and vulnerable. Among those disproportionately affected are society’s often marginalized and excluded populations (i.e. older adults, children, people with developmental impairments, including those with weak immune systems as well as the poor). With promulgation of social distancing and self-isolation among many governments around the world, concerns have been raised about the prospects of increased human rights violations, especially among states which, prior to the pandemic, had a proclivity for gross rights infringements (Amadasun, 2020a). Since such restrictions, as has been purported, are meant to upend the spread of the virus, caution should be exercised in its enforcement if social disruption or anarchy is to be avoided. For instance, the oil-rich city of Warri in Nigeria’s Niger-Delta region was on the verge of turmoil following reports of the killing of a citizen by security officials. These events, taken together, pose legitimate concerns to the social work profession. Alternatively, as a practice-based profession, social work has a crucial role to play given its stated goals of (1) advancing social cohesion and stability, (2) promoting social change and development through the liberation and empowerment of people and (3) restoring social functioning while enforcing respect for the sanctity of life, drawing on ideals of social justice and human dignity (Amadasun, 2020b; Amadasun, 2020c). Although the international professional body has drawn connections between the profession and the global pandemic, there is minute evidence to suggest how professionals (researchers, educators and practitioners) have grasped such interplay given the scant discourses and research in the professional literature (Amadasun, 2020d). To bolster interrogations, this article aims to expand on the IFSW’s statements by highlighting the interlock between COVID-19 and social work in the hope that such description will goad professionals to research action in the coming weeks.

Social work and COVID-19: The nexus

Recounting our professional values (service, human rights and social justice, dignity and worth of people, privacy and confidentiality, the importance of human relationships, and integrity), which COVID-19 has undermined and in some instances overturned, it has become increasingly notable that if any profession is most hurt by the pandemic, it is the social work profession. To this end, professionals must be at the front line of not only responding to the pandemic but also amplifying our action if we are to be taken seriously by critics and citizens alike. Starkly, social work is under threat today because the value of social justice is challenged by the deleterious impact of the pandemic on powerless groups. More so, the value of human dignity tanks in the face of resource and economic deprivation among many citizens who are unable to gain access to medical care. Our creed to ensure the entrenchment of human rights tenets in human relationships appears to teeter on the brink of defect in the high of flagrant human rights violations. As for privacy, my concern is how do we interact with and support people whose new state is not of their own making, in which case, their access to services and programmes have been undeniably constricted? Pertaining to service, this reflects an ethical obligation to protect the general well-being of society, yet society is currently under threat of hysteria and social service denial, especially for those undergoing traumatic situations. Pointedly, responding to social problems emanating from public social/healthcare domain is the raison d’etre of the social work profession; and addressing COVID-19 in terms of its grievous fallout on social conditions as a whole and in the lives of individuals, families and households, groups and communities, in particular, is a professional imperative.

Our ideal response

Given the rampaging onslaught of the pandemic on individuals and families, it is most probable that our response would be within healthcare institutions in urban, suburban and rural locations, but also within economically deprived households with no or inadequate medical insurance or knowledge of how to secure care. In this regard, social workers could assume the role of educator, counsellor and referral, linking care-users to care-givers. Our counselling intervention should draw on resilience- and relationship-building strategies, as well as strengths-based practice combined with a blend of spirituality, since many families and individuals – especially older adults – derive comfort from these dimensions.

Since organizations provide platforms for response, and since communities are at the receiving end of the pandemic’s effects, professionals’ response is badly needed in social policy practice. One-way practitioners can get their voices heard and impact felt in the policy arena is through advocacy. By engaging in social policy advocacy and demanding social protection for society’s marginal populations, we will be well able to make a significant contribution to cushioning the fallout of the global pandemic. Returning to social protection, social workers could advocate for ad hoc policy responses, as well as long-term policy options. Ad hoc policy action would connote advocating for the provision of cash transfers or in-kind services (e.g. food aid, medical supplies) to the most economically deprived households or groups. However, since social workers recognize that social welfare services are not a substitute for sustainable economic development (Amadasun, 2020c), it is suggested that long-term policy goals be set in motion. This could be concretized through canvassing for the provision of durable safety nets in the form of investments in pivotal infrastructure such as health and social care facilities and housing, and including afforestation or the preservation of the natural environment among others.

At the general societal level, social workers are duty bound to prevent social disruption arising from outlandish conspiratorial claims, rumours and fearmongering, and/or outright neglect by the authorities. Again, drawing on our educator role could prove instrumental in keeping the masses informed about the true state of affairs regarding coronavirus, and such statement or information should be framed around hope, resilience and the resolve of the human spirit to surmount any impediments.

Finally, social work educators – as conveyors of professional knowledge, skills, attitudes and values (Amadasun, 2020e) – are professionally bound to expedite action to conduct and disseminate research about (1) social workers’ response to protecting their client systems or service users from the COVID-19 pandemic, (2) the coping strategies of service users (e.g. of older adults, women, resource-deprived households) amid the inaccessibility to medical care in most developing regions around the world, and (3) our interventions for families undergoing loss – which could be of relatives, parents or any other loved ones or of socioeconomic or material loss – due to the pandemic. By engaging in research, the profession would be creating a vast reservoir of literature that could be fundamental (directly or suggestively) in dealing with future challenges.

Concluding remarks
Still dominating the headlines given its extensive import, it is no longer news that the COVID-19 global pandemic has sent many into frenzy, excruciating pain, hardship and death. Although equipped with historical legacies and top-notch values, the social work profession as a whole, and our professional literature in specific, has been engulfed with unusual quiet amid the grievous pandemic. Unless we draw connections about our profession and the raging global pandemic, as well as amplify our professional action in the face of the current public health challenges, our profession may continue to be accorded a second-fiddle status, or brusquely have its relevance called to question. Consequently, in order to prevent this from happening, it is imperative that we act swiftly but tactfully. This essay has defined our potential responses to the COVID-19 pandemic in order to set the stage for further interrogation and restates the fact that social work professionals are in a unique position to address the phenomenon. Finally, I will conclude on a reassuring note by reminding us all that throughout recorded history, the tenacity of the human spirit in our collective resolve for solidarity and survival has and will always overcome and outlast any plagues or pandemics or viruses (whichever name they are referred), and COVID-19 cannot be an exception.

Declaration of conflicting interests

The author(s) declared no potential conflicts of interest with respect to the research, authorship and/or publication of this article.

Funding

The author(s) received no financial support for the research, authorship and/or publication of this article.

References

Amadasun, S. (2020a) ‘COVID-19 Palaver: Ending Rights Violations of Vulnerable Groups in Africa’, World Development. Retrieved from: https://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/abs/pii/S0305750X20301807

Amadasun, S. (2020b) ‘Public Perceptions of Social Work in Nigeria: Does the Profession has What It Takes to Address Nigeria’s Social Problems?’, British Journal of Social Work. Epub ahead of print 20 August. https://doi:10.1093/bjsw.bcaa057

Amadasun, S. (2020c) Social Work for Social Development in Africa. Ibadan: September Publishing House.

Amadasun, S. (2020d) ‘COVID-19 Pandemic in Africa: What Lessons for Social Work Education and Practice?’, International Social Work. Available online at: https://journals.sagepub.com/doi/abs/10.1177/0020872820949620

Amadasun, S. (2020e) ‘Is the Signature Pedagogy Still Worthwhile? An Empirical Study of Field-Practice Experience Among Social Work Students in Nigeria’, Social Work Education. Available online at: https://doi.org/10.1080/02615479.2020.1771300

Author biography

Solomon Amadasun, a pioneer first-class graduate and phenomenal scholar, he is a leading voice in the global profession; with an unwavering bias to advancing gold-standard research, education, and practice in Africa.