Conclusions:
This study provides evidence that structural stigma is associated with the mental health of sexual minority men, both through proximal experiences and as a function of length of exposure to structurally diverse contexts, at least for those who move higher-to-lower structural stigma contexts. Findings suggest the importance of routinely assessing life-course structural influences on mental health and deploying interventions to address those influences.