Practicing borderless Christianity: Challenges and opportunities of the Covid-19 pandemic

Caleb O. Oladipo
Campbell Divinity School, USA

Abstract
The challenges and opportunities presented by Covid-19 are enormous, and Christians and non-Christians could take advantage of the pandemic to craft a borderless faith tradition. The Covid-19 pandemic has provided the opportunity to have a more comprehensive and positive image of every faith tradition, creating the best of all possible worlds for future generations.

Keywords
borderless, borders, Covid-19, pandemic, transnationalism

All borders are artificial, and the national borders of our world are not only geographical, but also ideological. Borders are most often erected out of fear and mistrust. But they also inform and transform human identities. Rigid national borders are monotonous, and they have diminished cooperation among faith groups and have suffocated the life of the Church.

The occurrence of the Covid-19 pandemic colonized the world in an instant, exacerbating geographical boundaries and shedding new lights on national and international inequalities. Proposing a borderless world, this article concludes that the hope of realizing a peaceful world depends on collective efforts to redefine what kind of world people want, efforts which will require both determination and faith.

Introduction
In One Earth Many Religions, Paul F. Knitter wrote, at the turn of the century,

As humanity steps into a new millennium, the religious traditions of the world find themselves at a turning point. Up until now . . . religious communities have understood themselves from within the circle of their own experiences and traditions; as this century slips into the next, they are being challenged to expand their ways of knowing who they are by allowing their circles to touch and overlap with others.1

Corresponding author:
Caleb O. Oladipo, Campbell Divinity School, Buies Creek, NC 27506-0567, USA.
Email: oladipo@campbell.edu
He went on to say that “the nature of our intercommunicative world and of the crises this world faces offer and require such a dialogical, correlational manner of religious self-understanding.”

The Church has entered a new era of self-awareness and introspection, and Christians now practice their faith in ways they have not done for over two thousand years. A Christian can travel to Lagos, Nigeria and attend his Sunday School class in Cary, North Carolina. A Christian in Buenos Aires, Argentina could worship in her church while on a business trip to London, England. A US Sunday School teacher could teach a class on Zoom while visiting relatives in Cape Town, South Africa.

The world is once again characterized by borderlessness as it has always been naturally. Perhaps the age of technology is one of the greatest gifts to the modern church. In a way, Covid-19 has required Christians to function and become more creative due to the old tradition of “necessity being the mother of invention.” Christians in the contemporary world have become more creative in the production and dissemination of Christian knowledge. Perhaps in this moment of vulnerability one can say that the Covid-19 pandemic has been a valuable gift to the Church of the modern age.

In spite of technological advances, however, most traditional Christians still desire the rich fellowship of being face-to-face in congregational settings. Many continue to long for a return to the traditional mode of in-person worship because human beings are social and gregarious beings.

Throughout 2020 and into 2021, human beings have been colonized by the Covid-19 pandemic, presenting new challenges to national borders in every country.

The challenges and opportunities of Covid-19

The Covid-19 pandemic had shed new light on myriad human disparities worldwide. The Western world, for example, hoards and wastes vaccines or becomes stingy about making it available to developing and low-income nations. The vaccine-sharing pledges from Western nations to the nations in the Global South have been too slow and often made available when the vaccines are close to expiration dates. Approximately 70% of people in the European Union were vaccinated by the end of 2021; the United States vaccinated approximately 60% of its citizens by the end of the year. Fewer than 2% of the seven billion people who populate the world, however, are vaccinated, even as scientists and health care providers in the Western world warn that vaccinating 80% of the world is the necessary solution to slowing down the spread of the pandemic. The shortfall of assistance from Western nations is glaring, with the consequences of nationalism continuing.

Fatima Hassan, a human rights lawyer from South Africa and the founder and director of the Health Justice Initiative, maintains that “vaccine hesitancy hurts the global Covid-19 response.”

Nothing was as discouraging about the disparity of the world magnified by Covid-19, however, as the protectionism of the Western nations. This reality became clear when the omicron variant of the virus began to surface in different parts of the world, especially in developing countries. The omicron variant first surfaced in The Netherlands 2 weeks before it was detected in Botswana, a country next to South Africa. When scientists in South Africa detected it among their citizens, the world took immediate and discriminatory action to lock out Southern Africa. Noubar Afeyan, the chairman and co-founder and chief executive officer of Moderna and the founder of Flagship Pioneering, stated that vaccines are still effective against omicron and urged everyone to keep up with vaccination because “we are going to get more variants.”

The more immediate negative impact of Covid-19, however, has been how it has affected Christians worldwide. The pandemic response of Christians has been impacted by the fact that churches were closed and many clergy and church personnel were dispirited. Those who depended on the resources from parishioners and church members became anxious. Some took the drastic measures of promoting vaccine hesitancy to the extreme, preaching against mandatory and government impositions related to vaccinations. In December 2021, Covid-19 claimed the life of a popular televangelist, Marcus Lamb, who saw the promotion of vaccine protection against the virus as spiritual warfare in the Church. Many of Lamb’s followers portrayed his rejection of vaccination and his skepticism as a good fight, and his death did not curb vaccine hesitancy among them, many turning deaf ears to the call from scientists to get vaccinated.

That the world has been misled on many fronts is incontrovertibly true, with the death of such vaccine skeptics surprisingly not proving to be a wake-up call to promote vaccination. Often, vaccine-skeptics have been seen as heroes, putting up a good fight, like Lamb, against efforts to manage the disease.

As the battle to curb the Covid-19 pandemic continues, Christians often persist in making the mistake of flatly dismissing as unwise those who argue against vaccination. Critics fail to consider that some, from various parts of the world, sincerely believe that their perceptions of God’s revelation are more believable than scientific facts. Science, they claim, does not prove, but probes.

And now, the “omicron variant” of Covid-19 has entered as a new term in our lexicon of health consciousness and vocabulary. The omicron variant has been unpredictable, a fact that should not be a shock to anyone. The greatest problem the world faces in the ongoing battle is the disparity in vaccine distribution. The co-chair of the Africa’s Union Vaccine Distribution Alliance, Dr. Ayoade Alakija, pulls no punches in her November 2021 BBC interview. In her assessment, the disparity in the world system is catastrophic and has affected Africans disproportionately. She asserted that if, in 2019, the Covid-19 pandemic had first been detected in Africa instead of Wuhan, China, the continent of Africa would have been known to the world as the “continent of Covid,” with the world locking the continent away and throwing away the key. Alakija believes that no resulting sense of urgency would have arisen to develop a vaccine or make it available to the African population of 1.3 billion people. Her contention is that until everyone is vaccinated, no one is safe. She also challenged African leaders to be more assertive about the needs of their people and the discriminatory practices they suffer from the hands of more powerful leaders in the Western world. African political leaders need to share their own stories, because until the world learns to write, the stories of the hunt will always glorify the hunter.

Today, as churches have become a bit more creative in how to worship technologically and what it means to congregate, Christians face a new world of global fluidity and now confront a world of transnationalism with the exciting challenges to dream new dreams that take seriously the Christian faith as a borderless faith tradition.

The coronavirus pandemic has been a gift to the Church in another sense. Christians have become more aware of their vulnerability to the rigidity and monotony of their own traditions.

4. Noubar Afeyan, “On GPS: Moderna CEO on vaccines versus Omicron,” interview by Fareed Zakaria, GPS, CNN, 5 December 2021, https://www.cnn.com/videos/tv/2021/12/05/exp-gps-1205-noubar-afeyan-moderna-omicron.cnn.
5. Ayoade Alakija, interview by Phillipa Thomas, BBC World News, BBC, 27 November 2021, via Twitter, https://twitter.com/yodifiji/status/1464609837875085317?ref_src=twsrc%5Etfw%7Ctwcamp%5Etwitter%7Ctwterm%5E1464609837875085317%7Ctwgr%5Eef8210f993b39697d399e57691766a85e8e0eb3%7Ctwcon%5Ees1%7Cref_url=https%3A%2F%2Fwww.timeslive.co.za%2Fnews%2Fworld%2F2021-11-29-watch-dr-ayoade-olatunbosun-alakija-praised-for-this-passionate-clap-back-at-travel-bans%2F.
Christians have realized that traditional face-to-face fellowship is not necessarily the defining mode of true worship and that one of the characteristics of true Christian fellowship is flexibility. Traditions are, therefore, fallible, and Christians are not self-sufficient. The Covid-19 pandemic exposed this vulnerability and the insufficiency of traditionalism.6

Questions about borders in the era of the Covid-19 pandemic

The Covid-19 pandemic has also vividly demonstrated that no restrictive immigration policies can stop human beings in their justifiable determination to cross geographical borders. Bill Ashcroft, an expert on nationalism and geopolitical migration at the University of New South Wales, Australia, observes, “Nationalism is always complicated by ethnocentrism, racism, and populism, and as nationalism proliferates, violence increases. But at the same time, post nationalism and No Borders politics . . . are growing apace.”7 This observation is especially pertinent when one considers the borderless-ness and the nature of the history of Christian expansion through migration.

In 2021, Eerdmans published a book by Jehu J. Hanciles, an African scholar and the D. W. and Ruth Brooks Professor of World Christianity at Candler School of Theology at Emory University, titled Migration and the Making of Global Christianity. The book is not only a comprehensive chronicle of human nature as moving from one place to another throughout history, but it is also a detailed account of migration’s responsibility for making Christianity a global faith tradition. Hanciles states, “It requires no leap of imagination to grasp that human migration played a huge role in the spread of Christianity among the tribes and peoples well beyond the Roman Empire.”8 Throughout Christianity’s history, ordinary people such as merchants, soldiers, government agents, slaves, pilgrims, tourists, entertainers, artisans, sick and health care providers, as well as priests and planned missionaries, were responsible for the effective spread of the Christian faith as they migrated. Hanciles leaves no stone unturned in his argument, restating it again in chapter 7:

> To restate my central thesis, human migration has played an indispensable role in the cross-cultural spread of the Christian faith principally because migrants who are Christians inevitably fulfill a missionary function in their encounters with non-Christian peoples and societies.9

That Covid-19 has proved a wake-up call to the nature of humanity and the Christian faith is also an incontrovertible fact. The pandemic has shed new light on the artificiality of geographical borders. Not only human beings, but also other creatures migrate. That birds migrate is common knowledge, and seasonal migration is common among other animals. Those of the Christian faith worldwide are now asking many questions they were not used to asking in the past. Foremost among these questions are what the world would look like without its artificial borders. Corresponding to the “borderless-ness” of the Christian trajectory from the time of Jesus, what would the Christian world look like today without the geographical borders imposed by political nationalism?

The world has many kinds of borders, some more porous than others, but technologically the world has no national borders enforceable in the modern era. Politically speaking, national identities exist ideologically and with rigid borders still characterizing modern nations. In

---

6. See Leander E. Keck, The Church Confident: Christianity Can Repent, but It Must Not Whimper (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993), 45. Keck quotes Jaroslav Pelikan, saying, “Tradition is the living faith of the dead; traditionalism is the dead faith of the living.”

7. Bill Ashcroft, “Borders, Bordering, and the Transnation,” The English Academy Review: A Journal of English Studies 36.1 (May 2019): 6.

8. Jehu J. Hanciles, Migration and the Making of Global Christianity (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2021), 189.

9. Hanciles, Migration, 269.
economic terms, there is only one world, fragile and fragmented in religious and governmental terms. In our newly globalized world, are attempts to enforce and protect national borders evil? Can rigid borders endure, considering the technological advancements that promote the porosity of geographical boundaries? Can human beings truly be free when classifications, such as rich and poor, democratic and non-democratic, Christian and non-Christian, remain?

Some reasons to consider for physical borders

Geographical borders have always existed out of the desire for domination by powerful and more prosperous or high-income nations. In the past, despite their power and prosperity, nations have not conquered other territories without fear of revenge from the powerless. Fear and uncertainties grasp and control people in the modern world because of bordering and nationalism. At least 77 border walls or fences exist in the world today, and most of them were erected since 2001. Walls are indicative of hostility, and building them is predictable. The erection of borders, however, is not consistent with the nature of Christianity, a borderless missionary religion. Other missionary religions include Islam and Buddhism, but no other religion is identified with missionary zeal and intensity more so than the Christian faith. Scholars have argued that the Bible itself is the blueprint of God’s sending in mission or Missio Dei in the world. Christians build bridges; they do not build walls.

What the Covid-19 pandemic has demonstrated to Christians in the modern era is the increasing mobility of Christians worldwide. Navigating one aspect of this mobility, the Church is trying to embrace the modern world of technological borderless-ness without becoming lost in it. Building bridges is unpredictable and life-giving, evoking silent gratitude from its beneficiaries. The Covid-19 pandemic has issued the call to Christians to become Christians and followers of Jesus without religion, to see Christianity as a tool for the transformation of a borderless world without an overriding compulsion to convert those who are not Christians to their own faith traditions. The vision of a borderless world where the Christian faith could flourish as an active movement originated with Jesus of Nazareth when he was with his disciples.

---

10. See Ashcroft, “Borders, Bordering, and the Transnation,” 5.
11. See Ashcroft, “Borders, Bordering, and the Transnation,” 6.
12. See Dyron B. Daughrity, The Changing World of Christianity: The Global History of a Borderless Religion (New York: Peter Lang, 2010). In the book, Daughrity argues that the Christian faith is the only faith tradition that has become truly globalized.
13. See Christopher J. H. Wright, The Mission of God: Unlocking the Bible’s Grand Narrative (Downers Grove IL: InterVarsity Press, 2006), in which the author argues that the Bible represents the activities of God in the world and chronicles God’s Mission for the transformation of the world. In other words, the writings that now comprise the Bible are themselves the product of and witness to the ultimate mission of God. The Bible renders to humanity the story of God’s mission through God’s people in their engagement with God’s world and for the sake of the whole of God’s creation. The Bible is the drama of this God of purpose engaged in the mission of achieving that purpose universally, embracing past, present, and future. Its center focus, climax, and completion come through Jesus Christ.
14. The statement that “Christians build bridges, not walls,” has been attributed to Pope Francis. In his statement, the Pope concluded that one of the challenges of the Church remains “to defend and preserve the dignity of your fellow citizens in the tireless and demanding pursuit of the common good.” “Address of the Holy Father,” US Capitol, Washington, DC, 24 September 2015, https://www.vatican.va/content/francesco/en/speeches/2015/september/documents/papa-francesco_20150924_usa-us-congress.html. See also John Carr, “The Role of Catholics in the time of Trump,” America: The Jesuit Review, 5–12 December 2016, https://www.americamagazine.org/politics-society/2016/11/14/role-catholics-time-trump.
Transnationalism and the borderless vision of Jesus of Nazareth

The Jesus of Nazareth that Christians encounter in the Gospels exemplified a transnational and borderless vision for the world under God. He constantly challenged religious leaders and his followers to cross social and religious borders. He saw only one world and one God, whom he called his Father. Jesus of Nazareth was open to “official outsiders” such as the Gentile centurion and Samaritans,15 praising them as examples of virtue.16

One of the most astounding claims of Jesus in the gospels is his transnationalism and borderless vision of God’s Kingdom. He took Gentiles seriously and was open to their unique contributions to the spiritual directions of the Kingdom of God that he inaugurated. Jesus established with his disciples a vision of the Kingdom of God as one that is borderless.

In Mark’s Gospel, John said to Jesus, “Teacher, we saw someone casting out demons in your name, and we tried to stop him, because he was not following us.” But Jesus said, “Do not stop him; for no one who does a deed of power in my name will be able soon afterward to speak evil of me. Whoever is not against us is for us” (9:38-40, NRSV). In the Gospel of John, Jesus said, “I have other sheep that do not belong to this fold. I must bring them also, and they will listen to my voice. So, there will be one flock, one shepherd” (10:16, NRSV). Thus, anyone who genuinely cares for the wellbeing of their fellow-human beings can also be valuable in the Kingdom of God. The contemporary world is interconnected. Our grueling experience with the Covid-19 pandemic has taught us that we will always need each other.

The challenges of bridging ideological gaps

True Christianity in its essence is not only a borderless faith, but also a faith that bridges the gap between God and humanity. One major difference in the interpretation of the relationship between Christianity and Hellenistic philosophy, for example, is the mediating principle or the bridge between God and the world. While Greek philosophers saw the Logos or Word (sometimes interpreted as reason or principle) as the necessary bridge because God (necessary being) cannot deal directly with the world that is contingent, early Christians viewed the Logos as necessary because of human alienation. The important thing to consider is how the Hellenistic philosophical tradition influenced the Christian faith and vice versa. The Greek concept of the Logos and the first chapter of the Gospel of John in the Greek New Testament is clear. Although it did not do so uncritically, Christianity subsequently assumed the Hellenistic vocabulary to justify and strengthen its claims. The early Christian Church fathers, especially in the traditions of Justin Martyr, learned that, as they came to grips with the Christian faith and presented it to their pluralistic world, they also had to make it more credible by interpreting it with the patterns of thought prevalent in their societies. Their societies and the religions associated with them varied from the Gospel the early Church fathers sought to proclaim. The strength of a bridging-of-the-gap approach was in accepting and taking seriously the differences between Hellenism and Christianity, affirming the unique contributions that each makes in ordering human lives and their spiritual destiny.17 Knitter states it this way: “Other religions are not only genuinely different, [but] they can also be genuinely valuable.”18 A careful relationship between one religion and another necessarily involves a careful inhaling and exhaling. Perhaps perilous for Christians is to cut off devotees of other religions in the age of a

15. See Luke 7: 1-10; 9:52.
16. See Luke 10:10-37; 17:11-19.
17. For a short but comprehensive treatment of the complementarity between Hellenistic philosophy and the Christian faith, see Caleb O. Oladipo, “Philosophy” in Encyclopedia of Mission and Missionaries, ed. Jonathan J. Bonk (New York: Routledge, 2007), 335–37.
18. Knitter, One Earth Many Religions, 32.
universal health crisis. The current era is one of interconnectedness and interdependency, and devotees of other religions will continue to need Christians as Christians need them.

Conclusion

It is not hyperbole to suggest that no other phenomenon in the modern era has demonstrated the interconnectedness of humanity more so than the Covid-19 pandemic. The pandemic has revealed human vulnerability and highlighted the fact that being human has no cure. It has blatantly exposed the weaknesses, as well as the strengths, of our humanity. Our natural rapacity and avarice, both personal and institutional, have been put under a magnifying glass. Our human nature has had no place to hide. The proposal in this article to dissolve the rigidity of borders can be realized only when humankind abandons and discards distinctions between rich and poor, black and white, Christians and non-Christians, East and West, and other divisions. Rigid borders are untrue and antithetical to the gospel of faith, hope, and love.

Author biography

Caleb O. Oladipo holds the inaugural Snellings Chair of Christian Evangelism and Mission at Campbell University Divinity School where he also serves as the Director of the Braswell World Religions and Global Cultures Center.