Objective: to understand the life experiences that favor transcendence of the elderly being.

Method: a qualitative phenomenological hermeneutic study, in two groups of elderly coexistence. The selection of participants was by intentional sampling: 11 elderly, achieving theoretical saturation. Data collection was carried out through a phenomenological interview with a detonating question. Ethical principles of the General Health Law in health research were fulfilled. Analysis with Heideggerian hermeneutic circle was performed.

Results: unity of meaning on the consciousness of a higher power for transcendence is highlighted, where spirituality and religiosity are resources of the elderly for strength, feel protected, overcome difficult situations and reach fullness; both favor the understanding of their historicity by manifesting enlightenment.

Final considerations: transcendence of the elderly being is favored with spirituality and the experiences of their daily life are imbued with a spiritual and religious relationship that give meaning to their existence.

INTRODUCTION

Currently, there is a noticeable increase in the elderly population worldwide, which is reflected in an increase in the older population, considered to be an older adult in relation to the chronological age of 60 years or older. Mexico is not the exception, because the increase of this population group also lives\(^{(1)}\), which puts into discussion if the years of life are lived with a good quality of health, so it is imperative that aging is visualized from a perspective of attention and care that favors living it fully\(^{(2)}\).

There is a variety in the way in which aging and old age are lived, this depends on sociocultural characteristics where the elderly has developed, sometimes it is marked by deterioration. However, old age must be lived with fullness, life satisfaction and with a sense of optimal quality of life\(^{(3)}\).

Each elder experiences a type of old age, their experiences and experiences are unique, so that if this is satisfactory, there is a wealth of lived experiences that have favored this vital path, so it is possible to access them and understand from a referential phenomenological the way traveled.

Phenomenologically, from Heidegger’s referential, these experiences, understood from their main actors, form part of the transcendence of being. Transcendence is manifested by a sense of maximum fullness in the being, a sense of joy, communication and understanding of the sense of life of the elderly, which reflects an old age lived in a satisfactory, successful and full way\(^{(4)}\).

The experiences lived throughout the life cycle of the elderly are a reference to apprehend the world and the understanding of the human being thrown into that world, is the clear experience lived in various settings that will make up a particular phenomenon\(^{(5)}\). Transcendence evokes that understanding of the elder about himself, a being thrown into the world facing different life experiences, which may converge to understand the phenomenon of transcendence of being from the unique approach of each human being\(^{(6)}\).

Frank\(^{(7)}\) conceives transcendence as essence of vital values, the encounter of a sense, a type of spiritual connection, that surrounds the harmony, the nature, the sense of fulfillment, of well-being and of the highest human values. When this search for transcendence is favored, people can express fullness, joy and vital satisfaction, it is a phenomenon that the nurse can promote by having a holistic and spiritual vision of the human beings that care for\(^{(8-9)}\).

Heidegger in his existentialist phenomenology, stresses that transcendence is a complex phenomenon in the human being, evokes the understanding of oneself in a given moment of life in temporality\(^{(10)}\). This self-understanding evokes various ways of taking care of oneself in order to transcend. In this way, authors point out that spirituality is a part of the human being, which is accentuated with old age due to the approach to death, which is why religious practices tend to increase with age\(^{(11-12)}\), standing out as a form of personal care.

Spirituality involves the awareness of a higher power and a relationship of harmony, peace and tranquility, a way of understanding oneself and the manifestation of personal fulfillment; whereas religiosity involves the practice of beliefs and spirituality itself in a given dogma\(^{(13-14)}\). Both are sources of well-being for the elderly and are found throughout life giving a sense of what is lived day by day\(^{(15-16)}\).

OBJECTIVE

To understand the life experiences that favor the transcendence of the elderly.

METHOD

Ethical aspects

The study complied with the criteria of scientific rigor for qualitative research\(^{(17)}\). The project was approved by the Research Committee of the Universidad de Guanajuato and complied with the ethical criteria of the General Health Law, the Helsinki Declaration and CIOMS Recommendations. The Free and Informed Consent Term of participants was provided and obtained by informing them of the project and their participation, anonymity was taken care of by giving them fictitious Sanskrit names by considering a key word that the interviewer identified in the participant.

Type of study

This is a qualitative study, with a hermeneutic phenomenological approach, using as a philosophical reference the hermeneutic phenomenology of Martin Heidegger\(^{(18)}\). This study was guided by the tool COREQ\(^{(18)}\).

Study setting

The study setting was two groups of elderly cohabitation in the community. One is a group of retirees who meet periodically to coexist and carry out various recreational activities, the other group is composed of various groups in a day gerontological center. Both groups of elders come to them to live together, so they are not institutionalized.

Study participants

For selection of participants, the criteria were: men and women over 60 years old and who stated that they felt full in the present stage of old age, an intentional type sampling was used\(^{(19-21)}\). This was first determined by an approach to the study setting that consisted of knowing the elders of the groups, were informal visits, dynamics known as approach to the study setting, in order to enter the stage. At a certain point they were asked if they felt full in this stage of old age, that question was selected because the fullness is the manifestation of transcendence and it was more understandable for them. Those who answered affirmatively were invited to participate in the study, were made aware of the purpose of the study and proceeded with the informed consent and general information of their participation. A sample of 11 elders was obtained that was achieved when reaching the theoretical saturation and this was achieved when converging different units of meaning to understand transcendence.

Collection and organization of data

The selected elders participated in the phenomenological interview\(^{(21)}\) by means of a triggering question: “Tell me, what experiences in your life make you feel full today?”. The phenomenological interview allowed to penetrate into the subjectivity of being and allowed him to reveal himself through his historicity. The interviews were conducted from May to August 2016 and their duration was between 50 and 140 minutes. These were audio-recorded with the authorization of participants and carried out by the main investigator in the space in which participants expressed feeling comfortable. In the gerontological center there was a place to perform them, in the group of retirees participants decided the most comfortable place to carry out the interview.

Data analysis

All the interviews were faithfully transcribed by the main researcher in Microsoft Word and the information was treated in Excel Tables. The analysis was of artisanal type through the hermeneutic circle of Heidegger that includes precomprehension (approach to the phenomenon in the speeches and literature: ontic vague understanding); understanding (ontological) and interpretation (giving meaning to the units in the light of ontology).[22-23]

RESULTS

In relation to the characteristics of participants, they were between 60 and 78 years old, the majority were women (9), with a degree (7), retired (6) and were Catholics (11).

In the speeches of participants the unity of meaning on the consciousness of a higher being for transcendence is appreciated, which includes two significant themes: spirituality and religiosity. The elder expresses the consciousness of a divine power, something elevated, metaphysical, whose name is god, recognizes that this power has accompanied him in his vital transit, sustains him, gives support, encouragement and strength. That god accompanies him and gives him the necessary strength to face adversity, as expressed in the following speeches:

All those things I had to overcome [...] I tell you, I find myself in holy peace with God. (Madhavi)

I had a respiratory arrest [...] I feel full because I recovered thanks to God and acupuncture, well first God then acupuncture. (Naidu)

It can be seen in the speeches that there is a clear difference between religion and spirituality, a remarkable clarification has between both, some beliefs teach that spirituality is a way for the human being to find himself.

The elder can be spiritual rather than religious as expressed by Omana that referred to believe in God, but not be in the church, she conceptualizes the idea of God:

I believe in God, but I’m not one of those who goes to church [...] the economic issue is not painful for me because I’m still standing, I’m healthy, which I thank God. (Omana)

In contrast, Karuna manifests to be in a specific group where they carry out practices such as prayers, songs, meditation; this corresponds to both religion and religiosity, the latter is conceived as the firm and convincing practice of religion.

I went back a year ago to join the Catholic group in a community called Malcaba [...] I am very happy because we dance and praise God with songs and that I also like a lot [...] one follows him and afterwards, meditating, they also give us a lot of meditation, prayer. (Karuna)

In this previous sense, a human being can be spiritual but not have religion; can have religion, but not be religious, that is, or practice, but it is defined in a religion; in the end, it can be religious and have religion, but it can not be spiritual, that is, it is practiced but it cannot be understood.

The majority of the elders manifested the term God, understood as a superior force that was present in all the stages of his life that moves his own existence and leaves the responsibility of his own death as it was treated in the subject of death.

The presence of God in a conceptual sense is wrapped in its Christian origin, since most of the elders identified themselves in this religion. Therefore, the idea of spirituality is related to the same belief of a Christian God.

Elders use the concept of superior power with spirituality and religion. Spirituality in this section focuses on that higher power that is mentioned and that is throughout the existence and is manifested to the elder, even in the form of revelations that make him come out of difficult situations and that sustain him, as expressed by Madhavi who mentions that God spoke to him in the form of revelation to get her out of the alcoholism problems in which she lived. Or as Ura who mentions that God allows him to overcome situations in life and that he allows him to do whatever he likes and that gives him fullness. Or Sati who recognizes that God gave him strength to cope with a situation of learning how to work:

Well, experiences of these that have been terrible in my life and I have seen that God has been with me [...] for me it was a divine revelation one day I was very taken this, although you do not believe it would be very long to explain, I had a revelation from God, in which I communicated to AA they came to this house for me, they took me a lot. (Madhavi)

God is great, God gives us what we can endure, he does not give us more, if God allows me and I have the resources, I can continue traveling, that is fullness. (Ura)

Blessed be God who gave me strength, the learning how to work because I had never worked in my life, he supports me. (Sati)

The presence of God is manifested in some way in a sense of the elderly’s own life that helps him to face negative experiences, integrating the satisfaction of his own life, the gratitude that is related to this life story, a sense of identity and in the end the fullness. The elder recognizes that God has accompanied him, that he provides him with strengths and mechanisms to live and motivates him by inspiring him the way forward, as Vani states that he thanked God for reaching his goals:

Blessed be my God after that road to travel so tremendous that still fills me with emotion, sometimes when I remember, but thank God and everything that happens I got to where I wanted to go because then my goal was to follow [...] but I think it was not so much alone, but it was also something divine that I decided to leave in order to get ahead. (Vani)
DISCUSSION

Following the analysis in the hermeneutical circle, it is necessary to establish an understanding and interpretation of the previous results. Two concepts are central and stand out. Spirituality refers to a personal encounter of a human being with the intention of looking for a reason for his own existence, a connection of his interior with a search in aspects that he considers important for that existence, such as the end of life, death, the meaning of life or with something sacred or superior, like the concept of God, involves the transcendent term in the theological sense, something that surpasses me. Spirituality does not always involve practices in an established system, nor dogmas. When this organized belief system appears and with dogmas, moral, ethical principles, or, a series of practices to be developed, then religion is talked about.

As can be seen in the speeches, both spirituality and religion are present in the elderly, a sense of connection, this connection term closely related to the gerontotranscendence theory that speaks of connection, communion, connection with the cosmic. A cosmic connection is spirituality, a phenomenon that according to this theory increases in the last stage of life: old age. Thus, the phenomenon of transcending the elder can be revealed in the existence of the old being as a being, not as an entity, because it may not be transcendent, but as a being, as a whole.

The spiritual and religious phenomenon was revealed as self-care as part of the understanding of the elderly in its temporality and historicity, this understanding is the transcendence of himself. This understanding as Heidegger mentions that “being there” is understood in his being, in a more or less express way. It is peculiar to this being to be, with his being and his being, open to himself. The understanding of being is itself a “determination to be” of being there. So that the Dasein or being-there old can exist to the extent that he does not allow himself to be enveloped in his daily events or in his life’s happening. Each experience that has taken him to where he is is a manifestation of his being and shows the existence of the elderly, this manifestation is his spiritual and religious essence.

It is agreed that the idea of the spiritual and religious are merged to make way for an encounter with something sacred, becoming God the main sacred subject of the elderly and enveloping that sacred spirituality to explain the “why” of what it happens to the elderly and backing up in religion to respond to it. Spirituality is inherent to man in his sense of existential and that this leads him to seek explanations, that’s when he looks for answers that he can find in something sacred, however, all comprehension goes beyond the practice.

Spirituality as such, increases in old age, as a result of a preparation to death, while religious practice takes a form of coping manifested in the same stage but mostly focused on functional losses. Not in so much, religious practices also help like confrontation to losses of social type, processes of mourning, a form to fill gaps that only God can fill with his concept of omnipresent and that gives peace and serenity to the elderly in front of this type of situations.

Thus, spirituality and religiosity arise as part of caring and is an essential part of self-care, or as Heidegger would say, of self-concern. One speaks of the old being as a self-occupied being that makes use of “what is at hand”; in the face of falls and finitude this spiritual and religious sense always manifests itself; in some way it is conceived as finite and sees its possibilities of worrying about themselves, among them they throw their very possibilities in those forms of concern, the old being wondered as mentioned Heidegger expresses “he asks himself: what can I do? It enunciates a finitude. What this question touches in its most intimate interest makes clear a finitude in the most intimate of its essence, and in the face of it rests on its spiritual and religious being. This connection with a God is also reflected in the fact that some men say that they give their life and destiny to Him because they say they are aware that God will call them to another life, others make use of their blessings in their daily lives, always sharing that be superior to ones understanding of the world.

As an occupation of himself, it involves him, both in tradition and in his own being, Heidegger refers to the religious/spiritual life, that faith is the resolution to feel in the presence of God, religiosity is a matter of morality and ethics that gives fact. Religiosity and spirituality are a phenomenon to bring the old being to its finitude configures it in its facticity. By taking these resources as at hand understands that they are for a manifestation in the way of being to exist in the world, religious and spiritual manifestations were present in the speeches. God appears in a large part of the life of the elder as a source of wisdom.

The understanding of being an elder involves understanding what has already happened as having been, not as past, because the past would mean that it is no longer there and although it happened at a temporary moment in his life it still remains because he integrates it to understand himself as an elder, the present in the form of continuing care. He knows that he is an elderly person and that he needs to feel full and fulfilled, as he understands he is guided by caring.

This is part of its historical being and is framed in very specific contexts, in this case the Christian. To this Heidegger mentions that “The factual experience of life is historical. Christian religiosity lives temporality as such”. Religion is determined by the social and historical context where the elder has been formed. It involves its relationship with the concepts, rites and beliefs corresponding to the teachings of a certain dogma.

Elderly man understands his future because he knows that he is a finite being whose corporality will end some day, he does not worry, but he is aware of it. Care continues integrating to continue what remains of their earthly life in the best way, with a full existence, a sense of existence where spirituality is present as part of their personal occupation, being spirituality and religiosity a reason of being same. Heidegger expresses care as “the original unit of the structure of the cure is temporality”.

These spiritual and religious resources configure the elderly and become part of that cure that has been liberated by the events of everyday life. Thus, spirituality and religiosity make him understand his being-been, his present and his becoming; this self-understanding of its temporality and its sense of being make the transcendent being.

There may be a connection between religion, religiosity and spirituality, because religion brings to the elder tools such as the ones mentioned that allow him through his practice to find a meaning to his existence, so that for him they all make up only one thing and can be experienced at different levels. They are a strength and a motivation that moves their spirit towards an understanding of what had been lived.

This religiosity allows him to share his own experiences with other elders. Religion also behaves as a mechanism of socialization for the elderly that allows the manifestation of faith and the support of other brothers with whom they feel accompanied and motivated in their daily lives.

Metaphysics leaves aside as what is outside of being and beyond, the old being in the past perceived as a “being at hand” the presence of a superior being, an understanding even of its finitude in the presence of something superior but that it is within itself because it finds its own meaning, that is a manifestation of “been”, in the present it is occupied in the way of coexistence with others in some religious rituals and in the future it is expected as a finite being but that is the wait for a higher power that calls.

This is a conception in Christian theology that does not infer about the existence or not of a god, but that it manifests as the cultural horizon of the elder being of a community that has transmitted this belief to him. Some do not participate in rituals in a way that they consider that God is still out of it, religious institutions are not entirely for the elderly, but he has within himself an understanding of something sacred and the sacred is not necessarily a god, there spirituality conceived as part of a finite being. Heidegger alludes to taking the consideration of the divine: “in the last universal objective consideration, the total human experience must be reduced to concepts and also God must be studied as a real object”.

Frankl makes a comment regarding religion and spirituality, spirituality corresponds to the human being in his very existence, is something unconscious, as unconscious is his desire to approach something that gives reason or meaning, the true religion will be that which the practical person with firm conviction and understanding.

The fact that being an elder has been conceived as finite does not mean that he has to deal with something as intimate as a type of spiritual occupation manifested by him. The elder expresses this spiritual occupation in the present, the future and the present experience of spirituality in order to reach its state of enlightenment(10).

This contemplation of oneself is an understanding of who he is as an elderly man, when he understands he is able to contemplate his temporality, he is able to contemplate all his abilities, possibilities, strengths and weaknesses and knows that his strengths are superior because he can guide them. Contemplating Heidegger’s words is an understanding that allows him to manifest a meaning, the being is enlightened and shows its fullness in an express way.

This care, as Heidegger correctly mentions, is the source of understanding of being in order to reach its state of enlightenment, that state of maximum fullness that has endowed it with a sense of who it is in its being and, therefore, existing in the world as a spiritual being. In spiritual care, the nurse can address the history of each elder and incorporate their own meaning and experience of spirituality in order to take care of this human response in the elderly in various contexts, from the promotion of spirituality as part of mental health until the interventions with the hospitalized and institutionalized elder.

Study limitations

The present study presented limitations, among which the access to elderly in community environments stand out, since in the city where the study was conducted, there was access to groups of elderly people. However, it is necessary to access the elderly in other environments, in the same way the number of participants can be a limitation, which in turn is a reference source for future studies on the phenomenon studied.

Contributions to Nursing

The present study has as contributions to emphasize the concept of religiosity and spirituality as part of care because they are resources that the elderly make part of themselves as part of their care, so nursing should rescue the phenomenon of spiritual and religious care as part of the discipline. The nurse should value the ways that this phenomenon takes in the elderly and the importance that they give to find meaning in their lives, so that the knowledge provided to generate models of care and interventions focused on this way of seeing is prevailing, the religious and spiritual world for the elderly.

FINAL CONSIDERATIONS

Elderly being contemplates itself throughout its historicity, which makes it a historical being with experiences that frame its temporality in the world, so care is a part of its being and makes it exist, since it is the occupation of himself in the everyday.

A part of that care is spirituality and religiosity, both as phenomena unveiled before the question to be about its fullness. To be able to express that fullness, a deep introspection of the elderly on himself was necessary, and thus his own understanding of spirituality and religiosity could be achieved as phenomena of care to face the everyday.

It shows that the elder is a spiritual being. This spirituality and religiosity are marked by the historical context and sustain the elder in his daily life helping him to find a sense of understanding of his life and therefore feel enlightened.

Spirituality and religiosity are part of care for nursing and their view from the phenomenology can contribute to punctualizing spiritual and religious care as a way of intervention towards the elderly. This study reaffirms the importance of the participation of the nurse in spiritual and religious care to promote transcendence that leads to the fullness of the elderly.
