On June 14, the Regents of the University of Utah voted to establish an Institute of Government at the University and named Dr. G. Homer Durham, associate professor of political science, as the new organization's first director. The Institute will coordinate curricula in government and politics in two ways: first, by including some of the courses in the Schools of Law, Business, and Engineering in the liberal arts training afforded political science majors in the School of Arts and Sciences; second, by extending, for selected students, the existing specialized curricula in the professional schools of the University to include broad training in political problems. The Institute also envisages the development of an in-service training program for public officials in the Salt Lake City area, together with a modest program of governmental research and consultant services.

The department of political science at the University of Minnesota has received financial support for a five-year program of studies on the intergovernmental relations of the state of Minnesota. The studies will be directed by Professor William Anderson, who will be assisted by Mr. Edward W. Weidner. The initial studies will probably be centered around particular major functions of government, such as public health, social security, and the conservation of resources. Each study will be designed to bring out the relations of Minnesota with the national government, with other states, and with local governments inside Minnesota, in connection with the function being studied. Following the completion of several functional studies, a number of cross-section studies will be undertaken to discover common elements in the various functional activities, with respect to problems of organization, financing, personnel, and procedures. It is hoped that these studies may serve to throw some light, not only upon the problems of American federalism and intergovernmental relations, but also upon the possible wider applications of the principles of federal government. Suggestions and inquiries concerning the program are invited.
Harvard University has announced a program in International and Regional Studies, embracing a general curriculum in international affairs and separate regional programs for Soviet Russia and for China and Peripheral Areas. Instruction in the general program and in the regional program for China will begin this September; the curriculum for Soviet Russia will be introduced as soon as practicable. The International Affairs Program will lead to the master's degree. Although designed primarily for those with government careers in mind, it will also meet the needs of persons interested in public or private international organizations, journalism, and commerce. The program is open to undergraduates only in exceptional cases.

The Institute for Human Adjustment at the University of Michigan announces the establishment of a Social Science Research Project in conjunction with the Metropolitan Community Seminar and the Flint, Michigan, metropolitan community. The Project will spend $20,000 a year on research in metropolitan problems in the Flint area. Its program involves a permanent full-time research staff and headquarters in the area and the creation of six or seven $1,000 fellowships, with additional allotments for travel. The work of both the resident research staff and the graduate students will be under the supervision of the Metropolitan Community Seminar, an inter-departmental graduate research seminar the faculty of which includes representatives from architecture, economics, geography, political science, public administration, and sociology. Further information may be obtained from Dr. A. H. Hawley, chairman of the Metropolitan Community Seminar and of the Social Science Research Project, Haven Hall, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Applications for fellowships should be addressed to the Dean, Horace H. Rackham School of Graduate Studies.
