Fostering the “Art of Forceful Speech”: Music in the Century Club of California, 1888–1920

Leta E. Miller

Music Department, University of California, Santa Cruz, Santa Cruz, CA, USA
Email: leta@ucsc.edu

Abstract
The Century Club of California (CCC), founded in 1888, was San Francisco’s most prestigious women’s club in the early twentieth century. The club’s aim was to promote intellectual growth and amplify female voices to help women enter the public domain with confidence. Weekly presentations featured renowned public figures and women who had achieved success in traditionally male fields. Rather than raising money for benevolent organizations, the CCC aimed to effect foundational social changes by informing women of the latest developments in all fields, thus empowering them to engage in political and social activism. Music played a critical role in furthering this ambitious goal; it had its own programming committee, which operated on an equal basis with those devoted to art, science, education, and current events. This article, based on the club’s extensive collection of unpublished materials, looks at the CCC’s first three decades, when the club promoted “the art of forceful speech” through modeling of successful women, providing opportunities for members to project their musical voices, elucidating new musical research, and supporting organizations such as the all-female Saturday Morning Orchestra. The CCC’s activities underscore the significant role female musicians played in advancing the New Woman movement of the time.

The early twentieth century saw a spectacular growth in the number of women’s clubs in the United States. In California alone, membership in the Federation of Women’s Clubs had, by 1922, reached 531 clubs serving 55,624 members. In San Francisco, the state’s largest city before 1920, seventy-three clubs belonged to the Federation in June 1920, most meeting twice a month.

To a certain extent these clubs were successors to, and developments from, the long tradition of female salons, which even in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries had become far more than social or artistic gatherings. As Susan Branson has shown, many salons in the post-Revolutionary United States began to assume a political complexion. Attracting an elite class of educated women and hosted by prominent figures such as Anne Willing Bingham, these salons

I would like to thank the Century Club of California for allowing access to its archives and encouraging my research. In particular, archivist Andrea Thurber has been an invaluable resource in helping me understand the workings of the club, providing photographs and biographical information on some members, and offering suggestions on this article. In addition, several scholars have kindly provided invaluable advice: David Garcia, Katherine Preston, Nancy Rao, Beth Levy, and Emily Ansari. Thanks as well to Frances Kaplan for copies of materials from the California Historical Society library.

1For a particularly perceptive view of women’s clubs, see Karen J. Blair, The Clubwoman as Feminist: True Womanhood Redefined, 1868–1914 (New York: Holmes and Meier, 1980).

2Wikipedia, s.v. “List of Women’s Clubs,” https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_women%27s_clubs#California (accessed April 6, 2022). On the founding of the federation, see Mildred White Wells, Unity in Diversity: The History of the General Federation of Women’s Clubs (Washington: General Federation of Women’s Clubs, 1953).

3Clubs and Presidents of the City and County Federation of Women’s Clubs, San Francisco 1918–20,” transcribed by Elaine Sturdevant, https://www.sfgenealogy.org/sf/women/wcd.htm. This link has now been disabled, but information on women’s clubs operating in San Francisco in 1918–20 can currently be found in the document “Yearbook of the City and County Federation of Women’s Clubs 1918–1920,” posted by Elaine Sturdevant and last updated on February 16, 2004; see http://www.cydrawls.com/CCFWC/index.html (accessed April 6, 2022).
welcomed politicians of distinction, featured heated debates on the major issues of the day, and touted the concept of “virtuous citizenship” as a justification for female education and autonomy. Through such political salons, Branson asserts, women functioned as a crucial part of the public discourse, complicating the widely accepted notion of gender-separated spheres.

Although many of the women’s clubs of the early twentieth century grew out of this activist tradition, some of them began to adopt a new focus centered on women’s professional aspirations. This new direction resulted in part from increased opportunities for women in higher education, which also provoked vociferous challenges from traditionalists. The University of California, for instance, opened as a coeducational institution in 1868, leading to questions about the usefulness of a university education for women. Expressing a common perspective of the time, a 1915 article in the New York Evening Sun justified the admission of female students on the basis of traditional gender roles: The state university (of California), noted the unidentified author, educates a “great number of girls … —thousands of them that are to be intelligent mothers of the future, able to direct their sons and use well the new powers that women are to possess.”

Institutions such as San Francisco’s Century Club of California (CCC), the subject of the present article, combated such sexism by reinforcing women’s role in the intellectual and professional life of the community. This education-oriented club formed in 1888, at which time it initiated weekly programs for members on Wednesday afternoons from September through May. The presentations in the club’s early years (some by members, but most by invited guests) not only spotlighted women who had attained prominence in fields previously closed off to them, but also served as a forum for female engagement in the wider public discourse. Music assumed an outsized role during the club’s first decades, functioning in ways that went well beyond that of a cultural ornament enlivening the organization’s wide-ranging disciplinary programming. In fact, in some years fully 50 percent of the club’s presentations included some musical component (Figure 1).

Certain legislative actions and judicial rulings in the post-Civil War period helped to boost women’s professional ambitions and gradually increase their financial, employment, and property rights. As early as 1879, California embedded in its constitution a clause forbidding employment discrimination based on gender. Article 20, Section 18 of the 1879 constitution reads: “No person shall, on account of sex, be disqualified from entering upon or pursuing any lawful business, vocation, or profession.” Not to overstate the case, however, women’s rights remained severely curtailed by law. As but one of many examples, a landmark Supreme Court decision in 1908 (Muller v. Oregon) upheld limitations on women’s working hours.

The seventy-three women’s clubs active in San Francisco in the early twentieth century fall into three broad categories: benevolent clubs, subject-oriented organizations, and clubs offering wide-ranging and often loosely defined intellectual engagement. Benevolent institutions began to proliferate after the Civil War and facilitated women’s entry into public life. In the area of health care, for example, women could approach politicians and businessmen “without jeopardizing their middle-class claims to gentility, domesticity, and femininity.” Charitable organizations thus became conduits through which women could influence the distribution of local resources. Some benevolent clubs included music within their purview. An example in San Francisco was the California Club of...
Subject-oriented clubs throughout the country included many devoted specifically to music. The main one in San Francisco was the San Francisco Musical Club (founded in 1890), which featured solo and chamber music performances at its meetings. It was one of three federated music clubs in Bay Area (the other two were not restricted to women).

The third category includes clubs with generalized intellectual goals, some of which included music, such as the Cap and Bells Club (founded in 1904) for “furthering the development of wit and humor; study of the drama, music, languages” or the Clionian Club (founded in 1897) for “studying history, including the art, literature, and music of Europe.” Within this third category, the Century Club (which continues to meet on Wednesday afternoons to the present day) was not only the most prominent, but also the most expansive in its purview. Its founding purpose was generalized and far-reaching: “to secure the advantages arising from a free interchange of thought and from co-operation among women.” The club achieved astonishing visibility on both the local and national levels. Prominent speakers at its meetings during the first quarter-century included Susan B. Anthony and the physician and minister Anna Howard Shaw (another prominent suffragist).

---

9 On music clubs, see Linda Whitesitt, “‘The Most Potent Force’ in American Music: The Role of Women’s Clubs in American Concert Life,” in The Musical Woman: An International Perspective, vol. 3, ed. Judith Lang Zaimont (Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1991), 663–81; and Linda Whitesitt, “Women as ‘Keepers of Culture’: Music Clubs, Community Concert Series, and Symphony Orchestras,” in Cultivating Music in America: Women Patrons and Activists Since 1860, eds. Ralph P. Locke and Cyrilla Barr (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1997), 65–86.

10 For a sample of the club’s programming, see Laura Bride Powers, “Activity in the Clubs is a Cure for ‘Nerves’,” San Francisco Call, December 12, 1904, 7, https://www.newspapers.com/clip/24205274/san-francisco-musical-club-programme/ (accessed April 6, 2022).

11 “Clubs and Presidents” (see note 3). The Edgewood Neighborhood Club, founded in 1919, encompassed all three categories. It was established for “social and musical intercourse among the neighborhood residents; philanthropic work and applied art.”

12 Century Club Constitution, Article 1, Section 2. The Constitution and By-Laws of the club are printed in the several places, including in the Second Annual Report of the Century Club of California, 1889 (Century Club archives), 16–29. This club is unrelated to the Century Association in New York.

13 A reception was held for Anthony and Shaw on May 28, 1895. They addressed the club on May 25 and 27, 1896. Anthony was elected an honorary member on January 20, 1897.
University’s first president, David Starr Jordan (on five occasions); architects Julia Morgan (who later designed William Randolph Hearst’s castle at San Simeon) and Bernard Maybeck (designer of San Francisco’s Palace of Fine Arts); Sarah Cooper, founder of San Francisco’s kindergarten movement; astronomer Dorothea Klumpke, who was the elder sister of composer and violinist Julia Klumpke; and photographer Arnold Genthe, known especially for his historic photos of pre-earthquake Chinatown. Titles and dates of their presentations appear in the club’s Annual Reports each year. The CCC was influential enough to attract politicians as speakers: for example, mayor and later senator James Phelan, and California governor William Stephens. Receptions took place for many luminaries, including composer Amy Beach and stars of the Metropolitan Opera. The club even hosted a reception for President Woodrow Wilson.

If the Century Club’s purpose was the interchange of ideas, why, we might ask, should music be included at all? Examination of the musical components included in the club’s programs suggests three responses. In the most traditional sense, musical performance reinforced women’s conventional role as the bearers of culture, widely viewed as a “civilizing force” that promoted ethical behavior. In a more progressive vein, CCC presentations frequently spotlighted women who had developed independent careers and achieved success in male-dominated fields—in music, most prominently in composition. Finally, at a practical level, the club provided opportunities for members to perform in a semi-public setting, helping them overcome a socially enculturated reticence. Mildred Wells offers an example of such self-restraint from the oldest women’s club in continuous existence (founded in Jacksonville, Illinois in 1833): “Though these women set forth bravely to raise education funds,” writes Wells, “they did not depart from the custom of the time that women should not take part in any public performance. Therefore, the officers of the Society requested gentlemen of their community, frequently their own husbands and members of the Illinois College faculty, to read their reports on public occasions.”

A major focus of the Century Club in its early years was helping women gain confidence in speaking publicly and persuasively, and thus potentially becoming a powerful force in changing established gender models. “Under the club’s kindly influence,” wrote president May Morrison (1858–1939) on the occasion of the club’s tenth anniversary, “timidity of expression has constantly yielded to the acquired art of forceful speech, thus enabling Club members to stand their ground freely and frankly in discussion of measures which they may either favor or oppose.” For women with musical training, public performance functioned as an analog to public speech. The club offered members an opportunity to break through centuries of convention that had discouraged, and at times proscribed, women’s appearances on the stage. The CCC and other clubs provided an opportunity for women to conquer their engrained “timidity of expression” by appearing in front of a sympathetic audience. Of course, we can cite many women throughout Western music history who transcended the censorious view of female public performance, but in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, most U.S. women still struggled to negotiate conflicting expectations: on the one hand, playing a subsidiary role to the men in their lives and projecting a demure public persona, while at the same time responding to the increasingly strong pull of full citizenship—both social and political. Whether through performance, lecture, or study, clubs such as the CCC offered a safe environment to combat conventional constraints.

Although the CCC convenes today in much the same format as in its early years, this essay focuses on the organization’s first three decades, a period in which the club actively served educated women as a gateway into their changing society. My examination of the nearly 1,000 programs presented at the club’s meetings between 1888 and 1920 revealed 254 that included music. I treat this large body of material in four categories: programs that (i) modeled successful women; (ii) provided opportunities for club members to perform; (iii) presented new musical research; and (iv) supported women’s musical organizations. As the discussions below reveal, each of these programming areas reinforced May Morrison’s aim of amplifying women’s voices, combatting a debilitating timidity by promoting forceful musical and verbal speech.

Club Membership and General Programming

The Century Club consisted of 200 (later expanded to 300) women selected by nomination and vote of the board. The constitution contains only one restriction to membership: 175 of the 200 members must live in San Francisco; the rest could come from elsewhere in California. The lack of any prohibition regarding religion meant that quite a few members were Jewish in a time when Jews were excluded from numerous private clubs. For example, membership lists contain the names of several women from the Sloss family, which owned the Alaska Commercial Company and were among the founders and long-term supporters of the San Francisco Symphony. The Slosses and many other Jews in San Francisco were active in Temple Emanu-El, founded by the German Jewish community in 1850. In fact, the Century Club welcomed the temple’s rabbi, Jacob Voorsanger, as a speaker on four occasions.

In terms of race, however, the club’s geographic restriction did, in practice if not intent, exclude African Americans, because San Francisco’s population was 95 percent white until the substantial migration of African Americans to California during World War II (see Figure 2; note the data for African Americans in 1950 as compared to 1910–40).

The geographic restriction was probably instituted in order to ensure a large attendance at meetings. With no bridges spanning the San Francisco Bay until 1936, participation by women from Marin County in the north or from the East Bay, where there was a larger African American population, would have been unlikely at best (see the data for the East Bay city of Oakland in Figure 2). As Richard Rothstein has shown, geographic racial separation developed directly from government-supported racist policies that began in 1883 with the Supreme Court’s negation the Civil Rights Act of 1875, and extended through much of the next century. Even if the CCC’s residency restriction was not racially motivated, we must not forget that the period under consideration witnessed the relentless advance of systemic racism in the country, developments of which club members would surely have been aware, namely the dismantling of Reconstruction, the institution of heinous Black Codes in the South, dozens of court cases supporting segregation that culminated in the 1896 Plessy v. Ferguson decision legalizing separate but (far from) equal schools and facilities, frequent lynchings of Blacks, and an outburst of racial violence following...
World War I that climaxed in the “Red Summer” of 1919. Yet, despite the club’s engagement with politics and social issues, as well as its documented interest in cultural practices other than those of its white membership, I found only one presentation related to African Americans in the 32 years covered by this study—a program of “Old Negro Dialect Recitations and Songs” by a Miss Alexander (no first name given) on January 28, 1903. The program did not pretend to be a serious exploration of, or even a focused engagement with, Black culture. Rather, it functioned as the entertainment for an afternoon of tea and fellowship. Club president Helen P. Sanborn mentioned it briefly in her annual report, citing it among the many “delightful” afternoons sponsored by the Social Entertainment committee: “Our social afternoons with their clever skits, their charming music and recitations, Japanese songs and darkey dialect…., their brave spreads of tea, and even sometimes cake and coffee, their good fellowship, as well as their good cheer, have been delightful,” she wrote. Indeed, Sanborn placed a higher value on

---

Figure 2. Population data 1910–50, San Francisco, Oakland, and Los Angeles, as recorded in the U.S. census. Racial categories reflect those in the census.

---

24Among the many books and articles that can be cited, the reader might wish to consult the following: Carol Anderson, White Rage: The Unspoken Truth of Our Racial Divide (New York: Bloomsbury, 2016); Cameron McWhirter, Red Summer: The Summer of 1919 and the Awakening of Black America (New York: Henry Holt, 2011); Stephen Middleton, David R. Roediger, and Donald M. Shaffer, eds., The Construction of Whiteness (Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 2016); and David Roediger, The Wages of Whiteness: Race and the Making of the American Working Class (London: Verso, 1991).

25CCC, 15th Annual Report (1902–3), 20–21. Sanborn was a protégé and close to an adopted daughter of the club’s first president, Phoebe Apperson Hearst.
“development and training through constant association” than on the content of the programs. Belying the club’s stated purpose (and in contrast to its central mission of providing educational enhancements), Sanborn characterized both the club’s musical presentations and its lectures as “attractive accessories” to the more crucial function of bringing women together “on the same plane; where wealth and social position play but a small part, where every woman stands for what she individually is worth.”

Despite Sanborn’s idealization of the club’s social equality, race was apparently not part of the equation. The white homogeneity of San Francisco’s population (and club membership) in these years may have also encouraged racialized listening practices, which reinforced the Otherness of U.S. Blacks. As Jennifer Lynn Stoever argues, such a “sonic color line” renders “dominant ways of sounding as default—natural, normal, and desirable—while deeming alternate ways of listening and sounding aber-rant.”

Recital programming at the club did indeed prioritize traditional (white) European classical music, but occasionally the women’s attention turned to other traditions, as we will see below.

The Century Club’s membership in this period included no women of color. By contrast, some predominantly white clubs in the nation did admit African Americans, and many Black women formed their own clubs during this era. Notable among the latter was the Woman’s Era Club (WEC) in Boston, organized between 1892 and 1894. The year 1896 saw the formation of the National Association of Colored Women, the first national Black organization in the country, later called the National Association of Colored Women’s Clubs. The most prominent African American club in the Bay Area was the Fannie Jackson Coppin Club in Oakland (founded in 1899). Like the Century Club, the Coppin Club included music as an essential component of its activities. Its stated objective was to develop musical and literary inclinations of its members and work for the interests and uplift of humanity. The club still exists and now focuses on civil rights and economic improvement for African Americans. As far as I can determine, there was no interaction between the Century Club and the Coppin Club during the period under consideration.

At the national level, the question of admission of Black organizations to the National Federation of Women’s Clubs rose to a crisis point in 1900 when Josephine St. Pierre Ruffin tried to take a seat as a delegate from the WEC. Over the objection of the Georgia delegation and especially the Federation’s president, Rebecca Douglas Lowe, the board offered to seat Ruffin, but only as a representative of several mostly white clubs to which she also belonged; they refused to admit the WEC as a member organization. The ensuing crisis intensified over the next 2 years until a change in the Federation rules effectively barred Black clubs from joining the national organization. In 1901, while this issue consumed the attention of the national organization, the Century Club held a formal debate on the issue of whether the “Color Line Should be Drawn in Women’s Clubs.” The presentation was part of the

_____________________________________________________________________________________________

26 CCC, 15th Annual Report (1902–3), 21.
27 Jennifer Lynn Stoever, The Sonic Color Line: Race and the Cultural Politics of Listening (New York: NYU Press, 2016), 14.
28 For a discussion of the history of Black women’s clubs, see Encyclopædia.com, s.v. “Black Women’s Club Movement,” https:// www.encyclopedia.com/history/encyclopedias-almanacs-transcripts-and-maps/black-womens-club-movement (accessed April 7, 2022) and the substantial subsection of the Women’s Clubs article in Wikipedia (“Women’s Club Movement in the United States,” https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Woman%27s_club_movement_in_the_United_States [accessed April 8, 2022]).

For a short summary of the NACW, see https://www.encyclopedia.com/history/biographies/korean-history-biographies/national-association-colored-women (accessed April 7, 2022).
29 See “Fanny Jackson Coppin Club,” Oakland Wiki, https://localwiki.org/oakland/Fanny_Jackson_Coppin_Club (accessed April 7, 2022), which includes a photo of the membership in 1916–17. The Coppin Club was quite small; in 1916–17 there were twenty-five members. The club sponsored some important musical performances in the area, including concerts featuring renowned tenor Roland Hayes. See also Shirley Ann Wilson Moore, “Fannie Jackson Coppin Club,” Blackpast, January 19, 2007, https://www.blackpast.org/african-american-history/fannie-jackson-coppin-club/ (accessed April 8, 2022).

30 Mary Jane Smith, “The Fight to Protect Race and Regional Identity within the General Federation of Women’s Clubs, 1895– 1902,” Georgia Historical Quarterly 94, no. 4 (Winter 2010): 479–513. Black women’s clubs also had a national organization, the National League of Colored Women, which formed in 1896 from the merger of the Colored Women’s League in Washington, D.C. and the Federation of Afro-American Women. On the early years of this organization, see Therese C. Tepedino, “The Founding and Early Years of the National Association of Colored Women” (M.A. thesis, Portland State University, 1977).
31 The debate took place on October 30, 1901 (CCC, 14th Annual Report, 1901–2, 39) and was highlighted by club president Mary S. Merrill in her report to members (14th Annual Report, 17–18).
club’s formal debate program, designed to offer the women an opportunity to “speak freely and frankly” (to quote May Morrison). The debates always included both sides of the question at hand; in this, and in all other cases, the women rendered no concluding judgment on the merits of the issue.

Many years later, in 1955, the Century Club again faced a racial issue, not of membership, but rather of facility usage concerning musical activities. The minutes of the board meeting of September 12, 1955 record a discussion of “the problem of repeated requests by colored people for the use of the [club’s] hall and [grand] piano.” The board approved a motion, which the present archivist notes wryly was “not our finest hour,” specifying that all applicants for rental privileges had to be sponsored by a club member.32

Despite the much larger number of Chinese and Japanese Americans in San Francisco, I found no evidence of Asian American club members. In contrast to the dearth of presentations on Black Americans, however, there was substantial interest in the history, culture, and politics of China, Japan, India, and Java. Of the 915 programs presented in the 32 years covered in this article, thirty (3 percent) dealt with Asian topics. Many of these presentations concerned Asian visual arts and some featured Asian or Asian-inspired musics: a Japanese tea ceremony with Japanese songs; a vocal quartet singing Japanese songs; a professional troupe presenting Japanese music and dancing in costume; a performance of Charles Wakefield Cadman’s Sayonara to welcome the “Ladies of the Japanese Red Cross Delegation”; singing by “Chinese girls” at a social event; and a performance by local Chinese children that accompanied a lecture on the 1911 revolution in China.33

Most of these programs featured performances by white club members. As the annual presidents’ reports make clear, the intention of the sponsoring committees was one of friendly inquisitiveness and a desire to promote a degree of ethnic diversity, in contrast to the virulent racism that had sullied San Francisco’s politics in the previous decades.34 Indeed, only 9 years before the founding of the CCC, San Franciscans had elected a mayor from the Workingmen’s Party, whose slogan was “The Chinese must go!”35

At the same time, however, these club presentations also reflect a prevalent paternalism (or perhaps we should say maternalism).36 San Francisco’s Chinatown was virtually leveled in the devastating 1906 earthquake and ensuing fires, which burned for three days and destroyed 4.7 square miles in the city center.37 By 1910–11, however, when the Chinese children sang at the club, the area had largely been rebuilt with wider streets and vibrant buildings. In the following decade the Chinese American community cultivated an assimilationist stance and Western instruments and ensembles proliferated.38

The club’s programs involving members of the city’s resident Chinese population reflected to a certain 32Email from archivist Andrea Thurber to the author, February 3, 2021. Thurber kindly provided me with excerpts from the CCC’s Historical Policy and Procedural Manual, from which this information derives.

33The women of the Japanese Red Cross Delegation came to the club on April 17, 1912. “Singing by Chinese girls” took place on September 7, 1910. The December 13, 1911 program consisted of a “Talk on the ‘Upheaval’ in the Chinese World by Mr. R. Liang Park [and] Singing: Chinese Children.” The “upheaval” was the overthrow of the Qing Dynasty two months earlier. L. Liang Park (Robert L. Park) was a journalist and an interpreter for the city court in San Francisco. In 1895 Mr. Park and several other U.S.-born Chinese-Americans founded the Native Sons of the Golden State (reorganized in 1915 under the broader umbrella of the Chinese American Citizens Alliance).

34The Annual Reports include a presidential report each year.

35Isaac Kalloch served as mayor from 1879 to 1881. On the Workingmen’s Party, see Elmer Clarence Sandmeyer, The Anti-Chinese Movement in California (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991), 63–75; and Charles J. McClain, In Search of Equality: The Chinese Struggle against Discrimination in Nineteenth-Century America (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1994), 79–83.

36For a perceptive summary of the issue, see Matthew W. Hughey, “Hegemonic Whiteness: From Structure and Agency to Identity Allegiance,” in Middleton, The Construction of Whiteness, 212–33. Hughey emphasizes that whites typically have a lower degree of self-awareness regarding race, that the power of whiteness comes from its normality, and that whites tend to be unconscious of their privileges. Roediger, The Wages of Whiteness, makes similar points about white blindness to privilege and the absence of racial consciousness. (This theme pervades the text, starting with the opening paragraph of the “Introduction” by Kathleen Cleaver.)

37A particularly enlightening source on the San Francisco earthquake is Philip Fradkin, The Great Earthquake and Firestorms of 1906: How San Francisco Nearly Destroyed Itself (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005).

38For a discussion of post-quake Chinatown, see Ronald Riddle, Flying Dragons, Flowing Streams: Music in the Life of San Francisco’s Chinese (Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1983), Chapter 5.
degree these economic, social, and demographic changes and might have encouraged the CCC to reach out to local Chinese American presenters. It would be instructive to know whether the children who sang in conjunction with the lecture on the 1911 Chinese revolution performed in English or Chinese and what their repertoire was, but unfortunately the documents preserved by the club offer no elucidation.

Considering the discussion above, one might assume that most of the women of the Century Club were part of San Francisco’s wealthy upper crust. Certainly the club’s first president, Phoebe Apperson Hearst (1842–1919; Figure 3), fits that profile. The mother of newspaper czar William Randolph Hearst, Phoebe Hearst was not only extremely rich, but was also one of the most generous philanthropists of her time. During her life, she gave away more than $21 million. Hearst was an avid fan of opera and supported musical productions, organizations, individuals, and venues.39 Despite having only an eighth-grade education, her primary focus was enhancing educational opportunities for women. She was a generous supporter of the University of California (UC), where she built a building for 39 On Hearst’s musical philanthropy, see Leta E. Miller, “Practical Idealism: The Musical Philanthropy of Phoebe Apperson Hearst,” Journal of the Society of American Music 10, no. 4 (November 2016): 383–421; and Leta E. Miller, “Philanthropy as Cultural Outreach: Phoebe Hearst and Music in Lead, South Dakota,” South Dakota History 47, no. 3 (Fall 2017): 256–87.

---

women that included an enormous space for concerts, to which she invited the entire student body in groups of about a thousand. She also endowed scholarships for women that are still awarded today (the grantees are called Phoebes). As president of the Century Club, Hearst could extend her support of women’s education to those who never had the opportunity to attend college, as well as to those who had graduated from the university—women with lively curiosity and acumen who were poised to make changes to their circumscribed social position. For the Century Club in particular, Hearst not only served as president for the first 2 years and maintained a constant membership until her death in 1919, but also gave the club a Steinway grand piano and underwrote the entire rental cost for the clubhouse during the first year. At $125/month, this last donation amounted to $1,500 for the year (equivalent to approximately $43,000 today). As the club’s delegate to the first conference of the General Federation of Women’s Clubs in New York in 1890, Hearst was elected national treasurer.40

An examination of the club’s membership in its early years, however, reveals that Hearst was more the exception than the rule. Some of the club’s members did come from San Francisco’s moneyed class, it is true, and, like Hearst, they supported musical causes. For example, May Morrison, though not a musician, gave generously to musical organizations. She and her husband Alexander were among the original group of subscribers to a fund established to replace the enormous Grand Opera House, which was destroyed in the fires following the 1906 earthquake. In 1912 the Morrisons subscribed for two seats at $1,000 each (equivalent to about $26,000 apiece today).41 Her estate eventually provided substantial funding for Morrison Hall—the music building at UC Berkeley—and for the Morrison Chamber Music Center at San Francisco State University.

Unlike Hearst and Morrison, however, most of the members of the club came from middle-class backgrounds. To learn more about their social and economic class, I compared the membership in 1908–14 to three lists that document affluence and/or high social status (the first two unpublished): founders of the San Francisco Symphony, contributors to rebuilding the Grand Opera House, and the 1911 Social Registry of the Bay Area. The symphony and opera house supporters were among the wealthiest members of the community. Symphony founders (295 contributors between 1910 and 1912) pledged $1,000/year for 5 years, equivalent to more than $25,000/year in 2021. Subscribers to the opera house rebuilding project in 1912 pledged $1,000–$15,000.42 Interestingly, of the 390 members of the Century Club in 1908–14, only 12 percent (forty-four members) appear on the symphony and/or opera house project registers. On the other hand, 43 percent are listed in the Social Registry, which is an indication of prominence but not necessarily of extreme wealth.

Fully 15 percent of the members during these years were unmarried, but most of the single women were not young. I found only two in their late twenties; the rest were in their forties or fifties. Consulting the 1910 census data for the nearly 400 members of the club in the period 1908–14 reveals little in the way of occupation, but for those whose professions are listed, almost all were teachers in public or private schools. Two were principals; one was a university instructor. A few were music teachers. Many others are listed as “own income,” presumably indicating an inheritance. Five out of six members listed without the title Miss or Mrs. were doctors. Members, though not necessarily wealthy, did need to have some degree of financial discretion: During this period, dues were twelve dollars a year (c. $350 today) and there was an initiation fee of $20 (c. $600 today). We can conclude from this accumulation of data that whereas some of the CCC members were affluent, most were middle- or upper-middle class. They seem to have joined the club primarily from a desire for self-education and intellectual enrichment. Their coveted “forceful voices,” however, were only possible in the context of their comfortable socio-economic position. The club’s programming offers no insight into what the 40Alexandra M. Nickliss, “Phoebe Apperson Hearst: Most Powerful Woman in California” (Ph.D. diss., University of California, Davis, 1994), 132; Wells, Unity in Diversity, 25.

41Unpublished minutes, San Francisco Musical Association, November 6, 1912, San Francisco Symphony archives, Davies Symphony Hall, San Francisco, CA. Unfortunately, the replacement opera house did not materialize until two decades later. See Leta E. Miller, "Opera as Politics: The Troubled History of San Francisco’s War Memorial Opera House," California History 92, no. 4 (November 2013): 4–23.
42Unpublished minutes, San Francisco Musical Association, March 12, 1910, October 28, 1910, August 18, 1911, November 9, 1911, June 26, 1912, and November 6, 1912, San Francisco Symphony archives.
CCC members might have expected in terms of enabling the voices of lower-income women, other than an often-expressed support for various community improvement projects and a desire to improve the lives of the poor through educational reforms (the subject of numerous programs).

The club’s constitution mandated political neutrality. The by-laws state: “No demonstration on behalf of any political or religious object shall ever be made by this Club; and sectarian doctrines or political partisan preferences shall not be discussed at this Club at any regular or special meeting.”43 Deliberations on religious and political topics that did not endorse partisan or religious preferences regularly took place, however, and always included progressive and conservative viewpoints. Nevertheless, an examination of the club’s programming suggests a reformist outlook, especially in the area of suffrage. (California extended the vote to women in 1911, 9 years before the national constitutional amendment.) At the same time, the club’s progressivism was limited by its own demographics, as noted above. Only certain voices were raised through its activities.

From its earliest years, the CCC’s building contained a large space for lectures, presentations, and musical performances (Figure 4). Its extensive archive, currently being processed, not only offers an unusual window into the general workings of a highly influential woman’s club that has been in continuous existence for more than 130 years, but also reveals the vital role of music in its proceedings.

Musical Programming at the Club

A group of subject-based committees arranged the programming for the CCC’s Wednesday meetings. For the first 2 years, musical programs were planned through a subcommittee of “Art and Literature,” but by September 1890, an independent music committee had formed, which set up about four programs each year. The first chair of this new Music Committee was Edith King Davis (1852–1909; Figure 5), a pianist who became the club’s president in 1893–94. The other five committees were Art and Literature, Practical Questions of the Day, Science and Education, Social Entertainment, and Formal Debate.

---

43Century Club Constitution, By-Laws Section 7.

Information on the specific programs comes from the extensive Annual Reports, which list the committees, presenters, and presentation titles. Unfortunately, the archives contain no actual papers. About three dozen recital programs do survive, however; and from 1898 through 1904, the reports list the full repertoire for recitals sponsored by the Music Committee.

The six-committee programming model began to break down near the beginning of World War I, allowing for a more flexible variety of presentations. From 1912–13 and onward, the reports no longer list programs by committee, but rather just by date. Nevertheless, music continued to have a designated committee, responsible for several presentations each year. Although this new programming model might have marked a good stopping point for the present study, I continued to 1920 to determine whether the restructuring led to a reduction in the number of programs with musical content. As Figure 1 shows, it did not; music continued to enjoy a large presence in the club. The year 1920 also marks a good endpoint in light of the death of Phoebe Hearst in 1919 (from the “Spanish flu” epidemic); the new paradigms for women that emerged during the “Roaring 20s”; and the advent of radio, which, although it obviously did not put an end to live performance, did alter dramatically the way music reached a public audience.

Like Morrison, Davis was part of the city’s social elite. Her husband was Horace Davis, a U.S. Congressman (1877–81) and briefly president of the University of California (1888–90).
In addition to programs sponsored directly by the Music Committee, presentations arranged by the other committees also frequently included music. Figure 6 compares the programming by the Music Committee (the almost steady, solid line at the bottom) to the overall number of programs in all fields (the dashed line at the top) and the actual number of programs that included musical components (the dotted line in the middle).

The sharp dip in the center of the graph represents the temporary decline in activity following the earthquake of April 18, 1906. The CCC’s building escaped damage, although it was on the edge of the fire zone. Following the disaster, the club rented its space to the California Supreme and Appellate Courts until August 1907. Activities temporarily ceased, but then resumed sporadically in September 1906, with meetings held in individual homes and at the First Unitarian Church. A Music Day had been scheduled on the day of the quake—a large event organized by singer Louise Marriner-Campbell (1837–1922) that involved a chamber orchestra performing the Bach double violin concerto, a Beethoven string trio, and works with voice. Of course, it did not take place.46

As Figure 6 shows, music had a strong cross-disciplinary pull. That the club’s Social Entertainment committee would consider music an essential enhancement might be expected. More surprising, however, are the number of presentations by other committees—for instance, a talk in 1895 by singer Marie Withrow (1853–1932) on “Tone Perception” sponsored by the Science and Education committee, or a session on the history of music in the United States in general, and the development of the oratorio in particular, sponsored in the same year by the Art and Literature committee. Marriner-Campbell, who appeared seventeen times in CCC presentations over a 27-year period, delivered the history lecture. Such presentations by club women—whether on music or other topics—challenged the coding of

Figure 6. Century Club musical programs, 1888–1920. (Graph created by the author from an examination of all programs presented during these years.)

---

45For details, see the “President’s Report” in the CCC, 19th Annual Report, 1906–7, 11–22. The General Federation of Women’s Clubs remitted dues payments for San Francisco clubs for 1 year and made payment for the following year discretionary. See Mary I. Wood, The History of the General Federation of Women’s Clubs: For the First Twenty-Two Years of its Organization (New York, Norwood Press, 1912), 235.

46Details about this canceled performance appear in the CCC’s monthly Bulletin for April 1906, printed prior to the quake. The club’s single-page bulletins list the presentations for each month with the program titles and names of the presenters. In this case, the repertoire is also given. Some copies of the Bulletin are preserved in the CCC’s archives, but not in an organized form. I found other copies among Phoebe Hearst’s papers preserved in the Hearst archive at the Bancroft Library, UC Berkeley, box 69, folder 10.

47The dates of these presentations were September 18, 1895 (Science presentation) and November 6, 1895 (Art and Literature program). CCC, 8th Annual Report (1895–96), “Report of Exercises, 1895–96” (unnumbered pages).
“knowledge” and “lecture” as male, thus emboldening female voices. The number of such lectures by club members increased over the period under consideration as the women gained confidence.

Programs that Modeled Successful Women

Century Club musical programming often featured successful nonclub members through presentations by female composers and performers. The club also reinforced such appearances by holding formal receptions for famous visiting artists, during which CCC members would typically perform. For example, in 1900 the club welcomed German soprano Johanna Gadski, along with American baritone David Bispham, who were in San Francisco performing with the Metropolitan Opera.48 The eminent guests listened to an afternoon of music for violin and piano by club members Claire and Elsie Sherman. More than 500 people attended.49 The two singers, along with soprano Suzanne Adams, came back the following year when the Met returned to San Francisco, on which occasion the club provided an exceptional opportunity for young local talent: The Met stars heard a program by the voice students of Marriner-Campbell.50

Actress and singer Lotta Crabtree, who commissioned a fountain erected on Market Street, came as a guest on November 22, 1893, as did composer Amy Beach, who traveled to San Francisco for the Panama-Pacific International Exhibition (PPIE) in 1915. The exposition had commissioned Beach to compose the “Panama Hymn,” which was performed on the fair’s opening day (February 20) and repeated frequently throughout its nine-month duration. Beach appeared at a CCC reception in her honor on May 12. As with the visits by the Met singers, club members presented a special entertainment for her, in this case a one-act drama set in San Francisco’s Chinatown.51

That the club sent invitations to such renowned musicians speaks to its mission of exposing the membership to prominent women in various fields. That such women accepted the club’s offer speaks to the CCC’s own forceful voice within the community. Beach herself, of course, confronted issues concerning the projection of her distinctive voice. Following her marriage to Henry Harris Aubrey Beach in 1885, she curtailed her public performance schedule at his behest, and donated the proceeds from any concerts she did present to charity (an expected female obligation). Until her husband’s death in 1910, she identified herself as Mrs. H. H. A. Beach and it was only with some reluctance that she began to use the name Amy Beach shortly thereafter. The restriction on Beach’s concert career during her husband’s lifetime led her to concentrate more intensely on composition, an activity he encouraged. At the same time, she received no formal training, as composition study was largely closed off to women in the widespread belief that music “could only be transmuted into great art by intellect and the ability to think in abstract terms, the latter supposedly found wanting in women.”52 In 1904–5,

---

48 The Met toured to San Francisco in 1900, 1901, 1905, and 1906, presenting more performances there than in any other city; the company was resident in April 1906 when the earthquake struck. For a brief account of the Met’s tours to San Francisco, see Leta E. Miller, Music and Politics in San Francisco: From the 1906 Quake to the Second World War (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2011), 14–21 (on the 1906 disaster) and 136–38 (on the earlier tours). For details of the repertory, see Gerald Fitzgerald, ed., Annals of the Metropolitan Opera (Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989).

49 The reception took place on November 28, 1900; the number of attendees comes from the report by club president Cleora M. Hewlett, CCC, 13th Annual Report (1900–1), 16.

50 November 27, 1901. Adams is mentioned specifically in the report by club president Mary S. Merrill (CCC, 14th Annual Report, 1901–2), 19, but her name is not included in the listing of the event on p. 36 (only Gadski, Bispham, and the wife of Maurice Grau are named there).

51 I have not been able to locate the text of the play, Kim Fa by Thomas Dykes Beasley and Mr. H. M. Francis. Four club members also presented the same drama on May 18, 1904. According to a 1914 article in the Past and Present of Alameda County California, Beasley’s play was “a little Chinese tragedy, ‘The Golden Flower…’ Some years ago it was produced by the Century Club of San Francisco to a fashionable audience of ladies only, all the parts being played by members of the club.” Past and Present of Alameda County California, vol. II (Chicago: S. J. Clarke, 1914), 383–85, transcribed by Linda Jackson, July 1, 2008, https://sites.google.com/site/alamedacountycaigenweb/biographies/past-present-of-alameda-county/beasley-thomas-dykes (accessed April 8, 2022).

52 Adrienne Fried Block, Amy Beach: Passionate Victorian (New York, Oxford University Press, 1998), 40. On Beach’s curtailment of performance, the attitudes of her husband, and the references to her name, see pp. 47–51 and 183–84.
the Century Club made a change similar to Beach’s: Beginning with the seventeenth Annual Report, the membership lists included in them provide first names as well as married names.

The club took special interest in female composers. On August 4, 1915, for example, the members welcomed two (male) organists currently performing at the PPIE, Clarence Eddy and Sumner Salter, but May Morrison’s president’s report singled out Salter’s wife, Mary Turner Salter (1856–1938), as “a composer of note…. Many musical people were in attendance on that afternoon and a very enjoyable impromptu program was given by some of the distinguished musicians present.”53 Mary Salter was a graduate of Boston College of Music, a voice instructor at Wellesley College, and a prolific composer of songs for voice and piano. The cover of the sheet music for one of her compositions, published by G. Schirmer in 1904, for example, lists fifty-one of her “Songs and Ballads” available for purchase.54 Salter was also one of the founders of the American Society of Women Composers.

When male composers performed at the club, their wives typically appeared with them. On March 1, 1893, for example, Edgar Stillman Kelley gave a presentation with his wife, pianist Jessie Gregg, and five others, including several club members.55 Eleven years later the Literature Committee sponsored another program of Kelley’s music during a commemoration of poet Edward Rowland Sill, whose texts Kelley had set to music. On this occasion, club member Mary Camden Wetmore (1861–1924) sang. She was very active in the organization, appearing on five programs during the period under consideration and directing the music on a sixth.56 Edward Schneider, composer and faculty member at Mills College in Oakland, performed on December 2, 1903 with his wife, noted mezzo-soprano Katherine L. Adler Schneider, and club member Elsie Sherman (1881–1938).57

If an opportunity arose to feature a female composer, the CCC was receptive, even if the woman was little known, such as Leila France McDermott (1854–1940), who appeared on September 24, 1917 for “An Afternoon with a California Author and a California Composer.” McDermott had published, in that same year, a book of songs for children derived from bird calls. At times, the club sponsored programs open to the public outside of its regular Wednesday afternoon membership meetings. For example, on November 22, 1910, 17-year-old pianist and composer Cecil Cowles (1893–1968) presented a recital that included a number of her original vocal and piano works. Phoebe Hearst, who eagerly supported many young musicians, helped to underwrite the event.58

Indeed, the club provided a platform for many aspiring local performers. Among the most important was pianist Ada Clement (1878–1952), who played there in 1902 and 1904, when she was just 53 CCC, 28th Annual Report (1915–16), 16. On Sumner Salter see the short bio on him in Find a Grave, https://www.findagrave.com/memorial/100242815/sumner-salter (accessed April 8, 2022).

54 Mary Turner Salter, Come to the Garden, Love (New York: G. Schirmer, 1904).
55 Kelley lived in San Francisco from 1880 to 1886. After several years on the East Coast, he returned to the city in 1892 and served as a critic for the San Francisco Examiner for 4 years. See the biographies of Kelley in Katherine Preston and N. E. Tawa, "Kelley, Edgar Stillman," in New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, 2nd ed., eds. Stanley Sadie and John Tyrrell (New York: Grove, 2001), 461–62, and in A Handbook of San Francisco Composers, History of Music in San Francisco, vol. 8 (San Francisco: Works Projects Administration, 1940), 164–69.
56 Wetmore’s father, Charles Camden, built the first paper mill on the west coast of Peru. Her husband Clarence was reportedly the first student to register at the University of California and graduated in the class of 1873. See “Mary Electra Camden Wetmore,” Find a Grave, https://www.findagrave.com/memorial/187891778 (accessed April 8, 2022); “Wetmore Estate Set at $591,112,” Oakland Tribune, October 6, 1925, 25, https://www.newspapers.com/clip/34336024/mary-camden-wetmore-estate-591112/; and “Clarence Wetmore,” Oakland Wiki, https://localwiki.org/oakland/Clarence_Wetmore (accessed April 8, 2022).
57 The program, entirely composed of music by Schneider, included three song sets and two works for violin and piano. Thanks to Andrea Thuber for finding the name of Schneider’s wife, who is repeatedly referred to simply as “Mrs. Edward Schneider.” The CCC program received a very positive review in the San Francisco Chronicle: “Music Afternoon at the Century Club; Mr. and Mrs. Edward F. Schneider and Miss Elsie Sherman Give the Programme,” San Francisco Chronicle, December 3, 1903, 9. A review of a November 6, 1903 program at the Lyric Theater complimented Schneider for her operatic voice with a “tone large and full of warmth” (“Music,” Town Talk, November 14, 1903, 27).
58 Cowles solicited Hearst’s support in an undated letter in 1910, which Hearst’s secretary answered on October 24 of that year (Phoebe Apperson Hearst Papers, box 71, folder 13). Hearst employed several different secretaries and they are not identified. The secretary would routinely write on the original correspondence the date on which a reply was sent, but the actual reply letters are not preserved in the Hearst papers. The San Francisco Chronicle published a favorable review of Cowles’s concert (“Plays a New Version of Omar’s ‘Rubaiyat,’” San Francisco Chronicle, November 23, 1910, 9).
beginning to develop her career. In 1917 Clement founded, with Lillian Hodghead and Nettlemae Felder, the Ada Clement Piano School, which incorporated in 1923 as the San Francisco Conservatory.

Similarly, the CCC welcomed three of the four Pasmore sisters—daughters of composer, pianist, and singer Henry Bickford Pasmore—who were making headlines at the turn of the century: Mary, violinist; Dorothy, cellist; Suzanne, pianist; and Harriet (more widely known as Radiana), contralto.

The three instrumentalists formed a piano trio that garnered rave reviews in the local press (Figure 7). Their exceptional skill led to the later success of Dorothy (1889–1972) and Mary (1886–1974), who were among five female string players who joined the San Francisco Symphony for the 1924–25 season; they were the first women in the country to be hired by a major professional orchestra (other than as harpists). Conductor Alfred Hertz brought in the women without any fanfare, quietly changing the gender composition of professional orchestras in the United States. The Pasmore piano trio performed at the Century Club on April 17, 1901, and the individual sisters participated in other recitals in 1893, 1913, and 1914.

The club also heard from well-known local male performers, but often they brought with them talented women. An example is Hother Wismer (1872–1946), whose violin study in Europe was supported by Phoebe Hearst in the 1890s and who later played viola in the San Francisco Symphony. He appeared on twelve CCC programs from 1891 to 1916, six of which also included his mother, singer Mathilde Wismer, “one of the oldest members of the San Francisco Musical Club and one of the most beloved and highly esteemed women in San Francisco’s musical and club activities.” One obituary upon her death in 1921 characterized her home as “the mecca of the local musical world.”

Recital Performances by Club Members

The CCC’s recital programming during its first 32 years included 397 individual performers—285 women and 112 men. Forty-six were club members. The men almost always appeared in an ensemble context, as did the majority of the nonclub women. Other than Hother Wismer, the most prominent men included Giulio Minetti, leader of the Tivoli Opera House orchestra and conductor of several nonprofessional ensembles (four appearances); violinist Henry Heyman, one of the founders of the city’s Philharmonic Society in the 1880s; violinist and composer Henry Holmes; prominent local pianist Fred Mauer; Henry Pasmore (three appearances); pianist and composer Ashley Pettis; organists Wallace Sabin and Uda Waldrop; pianist and conductor Walter Handel Thorley; conductor Theodore Vogt; and five San Francisco Symphony members—Kajetan Attl, harpist, Emilio Puyans, flutist, Wenceslao Villalpando and Arthur Weiss, cellists, and Nathan Firestone, violist. They all played in ensemble situations that included women.

The forty-six club members who performed on CCC programs were not widely known professionals and thus their appearances represented a significant stepping out from their daily (socially restricted) lives into the spotlight of public exposure, much in the same way as their nonmusician colleagues subjected themselves to the public eye by participating in formal debates and lectures. At the same time, some of these women were highly skilled, as evidenced by the “forceful” repertoire they presented, which required intensive training and a willingness to engage with music traditionally

---

59 On the history of the conservatory and Ada Clement’s school, see Miller, Music and Politics in San Francisco, Chapter 5, and the conservatory’s website: “History,” About Us, San Francisco Conservatory of Music, https://sfcm.edu/about-us/history.
60 Radiana, a specialist in contemporary music, premiered works by Henry Cowell, Lou Harrison, and others, and made the first recording of Charles Ives’s “General William Booth Enters into Heaven.”
61 Critic Redfern Mason praised Hertz both for admitting the women and for his discretion in not touting the decision to do so (“Alfred Hertz Wins Praise at the Symphony,” San Francisco Examiner, November 1, 1924, 7).
62 The May 20, 1914 appearance identifies the performers as the “Pasmore sisters,” without first names. However, they played an arrangement of Grieg’s Peer Gynt Suite, which means either violin/piano or cello/piano.
63 Letters from Wismer to Hearst are preserved in the Phoebe Apperson Hearst Papers, box 27, folder 19.
64 “Opening Concert of S. F. Musical Club,” Pacific Coast Musical Review, October 29, 1921, 8; and “Mrs. Wismer, Mother of Violinist, Dies,” San Francisco Examiner, June 30, 1921, 18.

65 For a brief biography, see “Maestro Giulio Minetti Dies at 91,” San Francisco Chronicle, April 1, 1958, 17.
coded as masculine/strong (e.g., Beethoven, Liszt), as well as by their performances of contemporary works (also a traditionally male purview). Especially noteworthy in this regard are violinist Elsie Sherman, cellist Ida M. Holden, and pianists Ina Griffin Cushing, Helen Andros Hengstler, Marie Wilson Stoney, and Ella Partridge Odell, all of whom presented music requiring significant technical prowess and who included in their programs works by contemporary figures such as Niels Gade, Christian Sinding, and Anton Arensky.

Figure 7. The Pasmore Trio, 1912. Left to right: Suzanne (piano), Mary (violin), and Dorothy (cello). This photo appears on the Web site of the San Francisco Conservatory of Music: https://sfcmhistoryblog.wordpress.com/2011/11/16/the-pasmore-trio/.
Many of these women served on the club’s Music Committee, and in this role helped to promote and encourage the musical voices of less highly trained members. In 1902–4, when programs were particularly rich in contemporary music, Hengstler, Odell, Cushing, and Sherman all served on the Music Committee.

Cushing (1865–1955) and Odell (1862–1927) were exceptional in receiving recognition in the local press, at least prior to their marriages. Reviews in the San Francisco Chronicle and the Oakland Tribune highlight Odell’s technical skills and single out Cushing as “among the best musicians of Oakland and San Francisco.” Cushing played in ten programs at the club, one of which, on February 17, 1912, featured historical keyboard instruments—an Italian spinet and a German clavichord. Odell made her first appearance (as Ella Partridge) on May 22, 1889 and then performed on thirteen additional concerts up to 1914. Because neither developed an independent professional career, their club recitals served as an outlet for their considerable talent, especially after their marriages.

As far as Andrea Thurber, the club archivist, and I can determine, nonmembers and members alike appeared on Century Club programs without remuneration. The club was seemingly influential enough that prestigious artists, educators, scientists, historians, and others offered their services without a fee.

Musical performances do involve some expenses, of course, the largest of which would have been renting and tuning a piano—a cost that could prove considerable for a young organization. The Annual Reports list expenses for “piano” in the treasurers’ reports, but without further detail; the annual outlay averaged $50–$70 (with a range from $36 to $111). In 1896–97, the club made a strong commitment to musical performance by raising $600 in subscriptions to purchase a piano. Before the members could act, however, Phoebe Hearst stepped in and gifted a “nearly new” Steinway parlor grand. (In 1954, the club replaced Hearst’s piano with a concert grand at a cost of $7,000 and authorized tuning it four times a year, attesting to the continued frequency of recital performances. The board sent announcements to music groups throughout the area advertising the availability of the instrument and the hall.)

Among the club members who performed on recitals, all but four were vocalists or pianists. One was a harpist, an instrument typically coded female as noted above. The other three were trumpeters, countering the typically gendered association of brass instruments with male performers. The three women—Ethel Beaver, Sophia Brownell, and Persis Coleman—performed only once at the club during the period under consideration, in a 1906 presentation sponsored by the Art Committee, but their membership suggests that the CCC was an attractive outlet for musicians who challenged traditional norms. In addition to Louise Marriner-Campbell (cited above), other vocalists who appeared frequently include Elizabeth Putnam (1859–1925; nine times), Mary Camden Wetmore (six times), and Marie Withrow, one of the club’s founding members. On October 30, 1895, Withrow and singer Anna Beaver (1852–1937; sister of trumpeter Ethel Beaver) staged a formal debate on music as a force

66 On Partridge Odell: “Ensemble Concert: The Second of a Pleasant Series,” San Francisco Chronicle, November 17, 1889, 16. On Griffin Cushing: “The Griffin Reception,” Oakland Tribune, November 10, 1894, 8.
67 Today presenters are paid a small stipend, invited to lunch, and reimbursed for parking.
68The highest figure was in 1892–93, during which a large reception required an outlay for piano and “music,” apparently meaning performers. In addition, a photo from the 1890s shows that the club also owned an upright piano, which would have required maintenance. I located two receipts for piano rentals at $6 each from 1893.
69CCC, 9th Annual Report (1896–97), 23.
70 CCC, 9th Annual Report (1896–97), 36. The CCC’s Historical Policy and Procedural Manual, January 18, 1897, calls the gift a “baby grand.” Photographs of the auditorium at the time, however, show that the piano was a parlor grand; see Figure 4. Thanks to Andrea Thurber for providing me with excerpts from the HPPM (email February 3, 2021). Hearst gave Steinway grand pianos to quite a number of organizations, including the library in the small town of Lead, South Dakota. See Miller, Philanthropy as Cultural Outreach.
71 CCC, Historical Policy and Procedural Manual, entries of March 8 and 10, 1954, November 10, 1954, and January 10, 1955. Excerpts provided in Andrea Thurber, email message to the author, February 3, 2021.
72The program, on March 7, 1906, featured paintings by San Franciscan Florence Lundborg and dramatic staging in four tableaux (CCC, 18th Annual Report (1905–6), 16).
73Life dates for Louise Marriner-Campbell, Mary Camden Wetmore, and Marie Withrow have been given earlier in the article.
for improving society: "Resolved, that Music exerts a greater influence for good than either Poetry or Painting" (Figures 8 and 9). Reflecting the club women’s adherence to a historical, socially based norm that discouraged them from appearing too assertive, the presidents’ reports often lament the dearth of willing participants in the club’s debate program. Withrow had no such qualms. She and her sister Eva, a painter, frequently took part in prominent public activities. Twenty years after the debate, Marie published a book of short ("staccato") aphorisms on the development of the vocal art. Her approach to singing emphasized the role of the intellect on performance skill, thus accentuating the links between music, rationality, and character development. “If we are normally healthy and normally built,” Withrow wrote, “all the obstacles to splendid vocal work are Mental. Attention must be turned to how we think, what we think, how fast or slowly we think, and what we expect to get out of our thinking….” In another pithy piece of advice, she writes: “At the sight of a new score, the Amateur begins to sing. The Artist begins to think.” Reinforcing the connection between music and daily living, the anonymous reviewer in the San Francisco Chronicle claimed that the book was “as much a work on how to live as on how to sing.”

In addition to recital programs, the Music Committee at times presented short operettas. Twice, for instance, members of the club sang selections from Virginia Gabriel’s Widows Bewitched, the first time

---

74CCC, 8th Annual Report (1895–96), 30.
75Marie Withrow, Some Staccato Notes for Singers (Boston: Oliver Ditson Company, 1915), 2–3 and 5.
76“Recent Books on Music and Drama,” San Francisco Chronicle, March 28, 1915, 58.
in 1894 accompanied by members of the all-female Saturday Morning Orchestra (discussed below) and the second time in 1910 with piano accompaniment.77

Presentations Highlighting Musical Research

Club members tried to stay abreast of the latest developments in all fields, and music was no exception. Historical performance practices and pre-Baroque repertoire, for example, were quite new areas of research in this era. One example of the club’s awareness of these areas of interest is Cushing’s previously cited performance on historical keyboards. A second was an extensive program on February 11, 1903, featuring Elizabeth Putnam in a lecture-recital entitled “Popular Song—Music of Olden Times,” including a variety of performers singing selections from the twelfth to the eighteenth centuries.78

The club also learned of new trends in composition. In 1902, for example, Humphrey John Stewart presented a lecture-recital on “American Composers,” illustrated by performances by his voice students and Ada Clement (Figure 10). Stewart included music by himself and eight contemporaries, all but one of whom were alive at the time; the one who was not (Ethelbert Nevin) had died only 1 year earlier. MacDowell, the most famous of the group, denigrated such all-American programs as political events that encouraged “musical protectionism” and he even discouraged references to himself

---

77The performance dates were September 26, 1894, and February 16, 1910. It is unclear how much of the work they performed, as the piece calls for solo tenor and bass as well as two sopranos.
78The complete program is preserved in the CCC archives.
as an “American” composer. Stewart, however, apparently felt that it was not only important to expose intelligent members of his community to American music in general, but also to feature contemporary (albeit mostly East Coast) U.S. creators.

Arthur Fickenscher, an early experimenter with microtonal music and the inventor of the Polytone, which could produce sixty pitches to the octave, gave a presentation on December 7, 1904 with his wife, singer Edith Cruzan. Attesting to the cross-disciplinary reach of music, the Social Entertainment Committee sponsored their appearance. This same Social Entertainment Committee presented two other programs featuring new technology: an 1894 demonstration of an “electric orchestra”—perhaps meaning recordings—and another in 1909 that showcased the Welte-Mignon player piano, which had only been introduced in the United States 3 years earlier.

Folk music, an area of considerable interest at the time, formed the basis for several programs. In addition to the Japanese songs referenced above, programs included folk songs from Germany, Russia, and Romania. The presenter of the Romanian program was Lucy Sprague Mitchell, the first dean of women at UC and a lecturer in the English Department.

This period also marks one of intense interest by ethnologists in the recording and transcription of American Indian songs, sometimes in questionable situations (such as Frances Densmore’s surreptitious notation of a song by Geronimo at the 1904 St. Louis World Fair). The resulting song collections inspired composers such as Beach and MacDowell to embed Indian melodies in instrumental chamber music and orchestral works. Others, such as Arthur Farwell, set Native American songs in miniatures for piano alone or for solo voice with piano, sometimes in a simple style, other times using quite adventurous harmonic language. Kara Anne Gardner links the craze for such “Indianist” music—manifest in an extensive output of published sheet music—to an antimodernist sentiment among middle-class intellectuals, precisely the demographic represented in the CCC.

Two presentations during the club’s first 32 years reference Native American music. The first, on November 19, 1913, consisted of a special program arranged by then-president Marie Withrow that contained three distinct sections: “Zuni Indian songs” sung by “Miss N. L. Walker”; “English songs” by “Miss Eva Falker”; and “German songs and Recitation of ‘Das Hexenlied’” by “Mr. Ernst Wilhelmj.” Withrow’s presidential report contains no commentary on this unusual grouping of

---

79 For example, see Richard Crawford, America’s Musical Life: A History (New York: Norton, 2001), 376, and Kara Anne Gardner, “Edward MacDowell, Antimodernism, and ‘Playing Indian’ in the Indian Suite,” Musical Quarterly 87 no. 3 (2005): 370–422.

80 The electric orchestra program took place on February 28, 1894; the Welte-Mignon demonstration on December 1, 1909.

81 Notable among the most reputable ethnologists is Alice Fletcher (1838–1923), who spent 30 years collecting songs of the Omaha Indians. She became an assistant in ethnology at the Peabody Museum in 1882, was later elected president of the Anthropological Society of Washington, and in 1905 served as the first woman president of the American Folklore Society.

82 Gardner, in “Edward MacDowell, Antimodernism, and ‘Playing Indian’ in the Indian Suite,” 371, cites her agreement with T. J. Jackson Lears in this regard.
reertoire, but it is possible that she consciously chose to use her influence as president to suggest the inherent validity of ethnically diverse musical expressions.

The second occasion was a dramatic presentation for voice and piano on January 29, 1919 called “Gesture Songs and Poems of the American Desert,” featuring Alice Ena Hicks Muma (1887–1938), accompanied by pianist Estelle Drummond Swift. Muma had graduated from UC in 1913; Swift was a well-known local keyboardist who was appointed organist at Berkeley’s First Unitarian Church a few years after this event. The two women presented the same program a month before their CCC appearance at the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority in Berkeley.

The printed program for “Gesture Songs” consists of a prose narrative followed by a list of “poets, composers, and authors” whose works were included in an uninterrupted presentation. Muma aimed specifically to evoke images of the desert (particularly at sunrise) and to reference the customs of Native Americans. Without identifying any specific Indigenous peoples, she writes that the program included “an Indian Fire Song”; a representation of an “Indian lover [who] woos his bride by strutting before his maiden’s house displaying his gorgeous blanket”; and an “Indian Mother [who] croons her baby with a flute song with which her warrior husband wooed her.” References to the home, to wooing, and to lullabies seem designed specifically to appeal to female audiences.

The composers listed at the end of Muma’s narrative were all part of the Indianist movement. They include well-known figures Charles Wakefield Cadman and Arthur Farwell as well as lesser-known ones: Carlos Troyer (whom Michael Pisani calls a “German-born con artist who affixed wildly imaginative ritualistic descriptions of Indian life in the Southwest to his melodramatic fantasies”); Los Angeles composer Homer Grunn, who set Native American tunes in a Romantic style; and Thurlow Weed Lieurance, who composed nearly a hundred songs based on Native American melodies he transcribed.

Muma’s narrative gives no titles of specific works, but it is easy to identify some likely candidates. Troyer’s Traditional Songs of the Zuni Indians (1904), for instance, includes both the “Lover’s Wooing, or Blanket Song” and “The Sunrise Call”; Lieurance’s Nine Indian Songs (1913) opens with a lullaby that the composer describes in words very similar to Muma’s narrative quoted above: “While the Indian woman croons her lullaby, her returning warrior signals his coming with the flute, playing the song he wooed his sweetheart with.” Gertrude Ross’s Three Songs of the Desert (1914) includes depictions of Sunset, Night, and Dawn. Cadman was likely represented by a selection from his collection From Wigwam and Tepee: Four American Indian Songs Founded upon Tribal Melodies (1914) or his older Four American Indian Songs (1900), and Grunn by a piano solo, possibly his “Song of the Mesa: Tonepicture of the Desert” (1916). The program included readings by authors who wrote about the desert and Native American cultures: Orville Henry Leonard, whose The Land Where the Sunsets Go: Sketches of the American Desert appeared in 1917, and Mary Austin, who studied the lives of the Indigenous inhabitants of the Mojave Desert and published The Land of Little Rain in 1903.

83. The program was a last-minute substitution. The Bulletin for January 1919 lists an art presentation but with Muma’s name scrawled by hand in the margin. The 31st Annual Report (1918–19), 32, documents Muma’s program.

84. A short article in the Pacific Coast Musical Review about a concert in June 1922 notes that Swift and the other performers were “well known in the San Francisco musical colony having appeared in various concert events…” See “Vought Artists Heard by Radio,” Pacific Coast Musical Review (June 10, 1922): 10. An untitled notice in the New Music Review announces Swift’s appointment as organist at the First Unitarian Church. See The New Music Review and Church Music Review 24, no. 284 (July 1925): 308.

85. “Personal Notes,” The California Alumni Fortnightly 11, no. 16 (November 30, 1918): 261, reports that the program would take place on December 12, 1918.

86. Thanks to Beth Levy for her close reading and comments on this section of the article.

87. On Troyer, see Michael Pisani, Imagining Native America in Music (New Haven: Yale University Press, 2005), esp. 169, 257, and the extensive note 15 on 361. On Grunn and the California Society of Composers, see Catherine Parsons Smith, Making Music in Los Angeles (Berkeley: University of California Press, 2007), 231–33. On Lieurance, see Pisani, Imagining Native America in Music, esp. 268–72. Pisani characterizes Lieurance as one of the most sensitive and empathetic white composers to set Native American melodies. Curiously, Lieurance is listed erroneously as “Lieurance Hope” on the CCC program. Clearly Thurlow Lieurance is intended, however, especially considering the similarity of Muma’s narrative to his own comments on his lullaby (discussed below).
This program surely drew inspiration from Farwell’s widely acclaimed lecture-recitals, which he presented in cross-country tours during the first decade of the century, and which, as Michael Pisani recounts, “spawned countless imitations by other performers,” who “also believed in the persuasive power of American Indian music as a source for composition.”

Although Farwell idealized Native American song, his work was hardly free from “overtones of imperialism,” notes Beth Levy. He mixed scientific anthropology with subjective reflection, eschewed in-person contacts with Native Americans in their home environments, and relied on Western notation and translated texts. Nevertheless, Levy concludes, even though his “attitudes toward Indians would never completely slough off their skin of exoticism, Farwell found in Indian ritual a valuable example of the power of music to unify and sanctify a community.”

Similarly, Muma aimed to use Native American communal ritual to project a wider vision of peacefulness and oneness with the natural environment: “No attempt has been made to imitate Indian gestures or movements,” she wrote, “but the desire has been to give an impression of the Desert—a call to prayer at sunrise, a visualization of some of a day’s happenings upon the Desert.” Her gentle vision of Indian life contrasts sharply with fierce portrayals of Native Americans more typical at the time. One egregious example with local resonance was Victor Herbert’s Natoma (1911), featuring a libretto by the San Francisco lawyer and composer Joseph Deign Redding, which had premiered with great fanfare 8 years earlier. Redding’s libretto depicts the trope of the submissive racial Other who supposedly is happy to subjugate their desires to those of whites: The self-sacrificing “Indian maiden” Natoma commits murder to ensure the happiness of her white mistress Barbara, not only forfeiting her freedom (in the end, Natoma converts to Christianity and enters a convent), but also suppressing her own amorous desires. Herbert’s climactic “Dagger Dance” from Act 2 is an egregious example of racial stereotyping.

In contrast, Muma’s idealization of Indian life reflected a common romantic trope of the time that served to counter the discontent many Americans felt with the increasingly industrialized world. “Playing Indian” could be empowering, Gardner reminds us, as “an antidote to overcivilization,” especially, we might add, for women seeking a place in an intimidating patriarchal society.

Support for Women’s Musical Organizations: The Case of the Saturday Morning Orchestra

One of the CCC’s most fruitful associations was with the all-female Saturday Morning Orchestra—all-female, that is, except for the conductor, Jacob H. Rosewald, who came to San Francisco from Baltimore in 1884 with his wife Julie on the advice of doctors to seek a warmer climate (Figure 11).

Rosewald (1841–95) had been superintendent of music in the Baltimore public schools, concert-master of the Peabody Orchestra, and a conductor and violinist with the Emma Abbott Opera Company. Julie Rosewald (1847–1906) was a widely acclaimed operatic soprano who appeared throughout Europe and the United States with touring opera companies. In 1884 she became the first female cantor in the country at Temple Emanu-El in San Francisco, cited earlier for the association of its rabbi and several of its members with the CCC. Despite Julie’s renown and the links between the temple and the club, she does not seem to have performed there. Jacob, however, did. In 1890 he played with pianist Edith King Davis and then founded the Saturday Morning Orchestra, which included the “daughters of many of the first families in the city.”

The orchestra

---

88Pisani, Imagining Native America in Music, 178.
89Beth Levy, Frontier Figures: American Music and The Mythology of the American West (Berkeley, University of California Press, 2012), 33.
90Gardner, “Edward MacDowell, Antimodernism, and ‘Playing Indian’ in the Indian Suite,” 372.
91Thanks to Katherine Preston for alerting me to Julie Rosewald’s career with the Emma Abbot opera company.
92“Prof J. H. Rosewald Gone,” San Francisco Chronicle, October 26, 1895, 16.
93On Julie Rosewald’s operatic and cantorial career, see the meticulously documented article by Judith S. Pinnolis: “Cantor Soprano’ Julie Rosewald: The Musical Career of a Jewish American ‘New Woman’,” American Jewish Archives Journal 62, no. 2 (2010): 1–53. Pinnolis notes that Rosewald acted as interim cantor between two male cantors, and that it is unclear whether or not she was paid.
94“Delightful Music: Amateur Performance by Society Ladies…. The Debut of the Saturday Morning Orchestra a Brilliant Success,” San Francisco Chronicle, February 17, 1892, 12. performed at the club on March 11, 1891, eleven months before its first public concert; it reappeared twice more in the following 5 years.95 Beginning with only fifteen members, the group first met at the home of club member Joanna Wright (1830–1919), a conservative Southerner who founded a local chapter of the Daughters of the Confederacy. Wright continued to act as president, secretary, and treasurer of the orchestra even after its size exceeded the capacity of her home. At its public debut in February 1892, the Saturday Morning Orchestra included thirty-five women and thereafter received rave reviews. Exemplifying the more traditional role of women in U.S. society, the orchestra donated all proceeds to hospitals and orphanages. By November 1892, the group was playing at the 4,000-seat Grand Opera House, which the anonymous reviewer in the Chronicle states (improbably) was sold out.96 The ensemble seemed to be flourishing, expanding to forty-five members the next year; but in February 1894 Rosewald resigned after a dispute about orchestra seating. He died the following year. Fritz Scheel, who made a splash in San Francisco at the 1894 Midwinter Fair and would become the first conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1900, replaced Rosewald.
Activating their forceful group voice, however, the women rebelled. In the interest of improving musical quality, Scheel had reduced the orchestra to strings and harp; he demanded a salary that was impossible for this amateur organization to provide; and he made “so many exactions and objections that the young ladies became discouraged.”97 The controversy raises the question of the appropriate aims for such organizations: in short, how to balance professional performance standards with much-needed training—especially for women, who had few opportunities to gain orchestral experience. Scheel clearly prioritized performance excellence over education. The women, on the other hand, craved an artistic experience that was mostly the purview of men 95The orchestra played at the CCC on the following dates: March 11, 1891; September 26, 1894; and April 15, 1896.

96“After the Concert…. Brilliant Success of the Young Ladies,” San Francisco Chronicle, November 3, 1892, 8. The names of all of the orchestra members are given in various press reviews.
97“Benefit Concert by the Orchestra…,” San Francisco Chronicle, February 18, 1896, 14.
and, as Morrison advised, they “stood their ground” firmly.98 The orchestra fired Scheel and hired band director Alfred Roncovieri (1868–1945), who rekindled the group’s enthusiasm and emphasized the organization’s training goals, but unfortunately he was not able to reclaim its former success. The last recorded concerts took place in 1896. Roncovieri subsequently became Superintendent of the San Francisco Public Schools, where he was able to further the cause of music education by introducing instrumental music instruction into the curriculum.

Conclusions
Judging from her correspondence and donations, Phoebe Hearst’s aims in supporting musical education in general and organizations such as the Century Club in particular were simultaneously practical and idealistic: Through her financial support, she could enrich the quality of the cultural environment; but more broadly, through her influential position in the community, she could help to develop enlightened critics of the arts and mold a more edified citizenry. Hearst was not alone, of course, in touting the personal and communal benefits of musical training—a concept well-established in writings of the time. Charles Seeger, for example, lauded the social benefits of music in a 1912 talk at a “grand orchestra concert” that initiated the San Francisco People’s Philharmonic, heralding music “as a preventative of crime, a stimulator of intelligence, and a force for character development.”99

The Century Club similarly underscored the crucial role of music in society. Rather than raising money for benevolent organizations—a worthy cause to be sure, but also a stereotypical female one—the club supported foundational gender transformations by enhancing women’s knowledge of the latest developments in science, social science, and the arts; promoting a positive self-image; and, most importantly, amplifying their voices. By furthering female learning through presentations covering a wide variety of topics (music prominent among them) and encouraging members to develop the self-confidence to speak out and perform in public with conviction in these presentations, the club buttressed the ambitions of the forthright and determined women of the era who were entering the public workforce.

That is not to say that the members of the Century Club ignored concerns about children and the home. Many club presentations dealt with reforms to enhance pre-college education. In addition to the appearances of Sarah Cooper, the instigator of the kindergarten movement in the city, the club welcomed Estelle Carpenter (1874–1948), Supervisor of Music for the San Francisco Public Schools from 1897 to 1945; she conducted a children’s chorus from the Redding Primary School as part of a Thanksgiving program on November 23, 1904. Carpenter, who was known as “that dynamo in skirts…,” used her public position to speak out with her own forceful voice. As a biographical sketch of her has noted, “Under her guidance… the school system initiated one of the most innovative and thorough musical programs in the nation.”100 Like Seeger, Carpenter underscored the power of music to shape individual character. In a 1916 letter to her supervisor, superintendent Roncovieri, she wrote that the emotions may be intensified and uplifted by the continuous use of the right kind of music. This will have the correct effect upon the impulses. There is no other subject that can so grip the whole child. It gives him poise, power, and a higher development, because it gives him a higher love…. If rightly used music has the power to formulate the motives of life.101

---

98 On the history of women’s orchestras, see Carol Neuls-Bates, “Women’s Orchestras in the United States, 1925–45,” in Women Making Music, eds. Jane Bowers and Judith Tick (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986), 349–69.
99 “More Music Needed, Declares Professor,” San Francisco Bulletin, November 16, 1912, 4; and “Good Music Can Prevent Crime,” San Francisco Examiner, November 16, 1912, 4. The People’s Philharmonic was a semi-professional orchestra that offered concerts at prices far below those charged by the San Francisco Symphony. On this organization, see Jason Gibbs, “‘The Best Music at the Lowest Price’: People’s Music in San Francisco,” MLA Northern California Newsletter 17, no. 1 (Fall 2002).
100 The quotation is taken from a biography included in the “Finding Aid to the Estelle Carpenter Papers, 1891–1948 MS 1577A,” California Historical Society, Online Archives of California, last revised 2009, https://oac.cdlib.org/findaid/ark:/13030/kt238n0ih/entire_text/.
101 Unpublished letter, Estelle Carpenter to Alfred Roncovieri, August 1, 1916. Original in the Estelle Carpenter Papers, California Historical Society, MS 1577A, box 1. Thanks to Frances Kaplan for providing me with a digital copy of this important letter.
Carpenter does not define the “right kind of music,” but in her letter she emphasized the choral music activities in the schools and advocated for music by modern composers in general and California composers in particular.

The Century Club women, like Seeger, Carpenter, and many others, considered music an integral, necessary, formulative, and defining constituent of civilized life. Their support of artistic creativeness enriched the local musical environment and stimulated debate about the proper role of the arts in the public sphere. The club’s prominent inclusion of music at once reinforced women’s traditional role as the bearers of culture, while also moving well beyond that limited goal by encouraging women in music (and many other professions) to enter public life with confidence.

Like the mostly white middle-class women populating the energetic New Woman movement of the time, the members of the Century Club pursued an ideal of gender equality through the lens of their own comfortable social position, which provided them the leisure and opportunity to break out of constricted gender roles. Indeed, the wealth of women such as Phoebe Hearst actually gave them some degree of independence to promote a progressive agenda (albeit limited by racial and demographic boundaries) without provoking condescending or disparaging responses. Women artists and writers have long been hailed as a vital part of this movement. The activities of the Century Club underscore the contributing role of female musicians as well—performers, researchers, scholars, and composers.

References

Archival Sources

Carpenter, Estelle. Papers. MS 1577A. California Historical Society, San Francisco.
Century Club archives. Century Club of California, San Francisco.
Hearst, Phoebe Apperson. Papers. Bancroft Library, University of California, Berkeley.
San Francisco Symphony archives.

Books and Articles

A Handbook of San Francisco Composers. History of Music in San Francisco, vol. 8. San Francisco: Works Projects Administration, 1940.
Anderson, Carol. White Rage: The Unspoken Truth of Our Racial Divide. New York: Bloomsbury, 2016.
Blair, Karen J. The Clubwoman as Feminist: True Womanhood Redefined, 1868–1914. New York: Holmes and Meier, 1980.
Block, Adrienne Fried. Amy Beach: Passionate Victorian. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
Branson, Susan. These Fiery Frenchified Dames: Women and Political Culture in Early National Philadelphia. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001.
Constitution of the State of California as printed in The Statutes of California, Passed at the Twenty-Third Session of the Legislature, 1880. Available on-line at https://archives.cdn.sos.ca.gov; accessed April 6, 2022.
Crawford, Richard. America’s Musical Life: A History. New York: Norton, 2001.
Find a Grave, “Mary Electra Camden Wetmore,” https://www.findagrave.com/memorial/187891778, accessed April 8, 2022.
Find a Grave. “Sumner Salter,” https://www.findagrave.com/memorial/100242815/sumner-salter, accessed April 8, 2022.
Fitzgerald, Gerald, ed. Annals of the Metropolitan Opera. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1989.
Fradkin, Philip. The Great Earthquake and Firestorms of 1906: How San Francisco Nearly Destroyed Itself. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2005.
Gardner, Kara Anne. “Edward MacDowell, Antimodernism, and ‘Playing Indian’ in the Indian Suite.” Musical Quarterly 87 no. 3 (2005): 370–422.
Gibbs, Jason. “’The Best Music at the Lowest Price’: People’s Music in San Francisco.” MLA Northern California Newsletter 17 no. 1 (Fall 2002).
Ginzberg, Lori. Women and the Work of Benevolence: Morality, Politics and Class in the Nineteenth Century United States. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1990.
Irwin, Mary Ann. “‘Going About and Doing Good’: The Lady Managers of San Francisco, 1850–1880.” In California Women and Politics: From the Gold Rush to the Great Depression, edited by Robert W. Cherney, Mary Ann Irwin, and Ann Marie Wilson, 27–57. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 2011.
Kerber, Linda K. “Separate Spheres, Female Worlds, Woman’s Place: The Rhetoric of Women’s History.” Journal of American History 75, no. 1 (June 1988): 9–39.
Levy, Beth. Frontier Figures: American Music and The Mythology of the American West. Berkeley, University of California Press, 2012.
Leta Miller, Professor Emerita at the University of California, Santa Cruz, has published widely on twentieth-century music, including her 2011 book Music and Politics in San Francisco and biographies of composers Aaron Jay Kernis and Chen Yi. She has authored three books on Lou Harrison and more than twenty articles on Harrison, John Cage, Henry Cowell, Charles Ives; music in the San Francisco area; and the musical philanthropy of Phoebe Apperson Hearst.