Lector in Fabula: The Poet's Notebooks

Rishma Dunlop, York University
Art by Suzanne Northcott

Notebook 1
Opening the Memory Chamber: Scar Tissue, Testimony, Beauty

Little as I knew you I knew you: little as you knew me you know me —that’s the light we stand under when we meet.

My testimony: yours: Trying to keep faith not with each other exactly yet it’s the one known and unknown who stands for, imagines the other with whom faith could be kept.

Adrienne Rich, “Inscriptions”
Theoria [L. theoria, a theory, from Gr. Theoria, a looking at, from theoreo, to see, from theoros, an observer.] A supposition explaining something; a doctrine or scheme of things resting merely on speculation; hypothesis; plan or system suggested...

Scar 1. The mark left on the skin after the healing of a wound or sore; a cicatrix. 2. Any mark, damage or lasting effect from past injury, stress.

Testimony 1. A statement or affirmation of a fact, as before a court. 2. Evidence; proof; also the aggregate of proof offered in a case. 3. The act of testifying; attestation. 4. Public declaration regarding some experience. 5. The Old Testament Scriptures of the Decalogue. [L testimonium testis witness. Testament as in last will and testament. Words to die in.

Beauty the quality attributed to whatever pleases the senses or mind, as by line, color, form, texture, proportion, rhythmic motion, tone, etc., or by behavior, attitude.

***

Cartography

I once believed that one word had the power to change things. That language was a skin we could inhabit. Now I know that poems are theories, carving memory into the long spine of history. We are caught in the throat, voicing the hours. And the poet’s exile is pure sound at the scarred edges of the world’s body.

Country, nation, history. I am changing the story. My hand is moving across your page and it is in the mapping of your bones and sinews that I find the words: grief, love, beauty, testament. Your mouth yields the vermilion fruit of the word home. Let me die here.

***
Notebook 2
Lector in Fabula: New Literacies

Vespers

My heart
is caught in its own traps snares of its own making addicted to the beauty of words mainlining dictionaries and weather maps

I contemplate my brokenness want the language of storms and music

I ride the kisses of zephyrs and arias wild, symphonic gusts
I want this velocity

my art is uncertain
the tongue struggles unhinged

reason drowns in the river’s ridged embankments my body is water, translucent sliding dark beneath the pool

c. Language and Literacy. 2004. 6(1). www.educ.queensu.ca/~landl
I gulp for air
the taste of gracenotes,
ascending scales
in sea winds and tidal pools,
the dark voice of the gulf,
the sea’s throat
perpetual angelus

the poem ripples to the surface,
opaline light of unknowing,
the mind’s fluorescence
at the still point of the turning world,
the heart’s scriptures
thawing
a soft rain, falling falling

***
Lector in Fabula

I am reading in a school of dreams, a lost girl in a night’s tale, wandering through a jardin d’essais, underfoot, the crunch of pale green lichen on the forest floor.

Hyacinth gardens fade into a scene of city lights and I am on Vancouver’s Hasting’s Street.
The pages become stained with east end rot, humanity pumping heroin through collapsed veins and there on the corner is a woman weeping, the sound of her pain palpable in every crack of concrete, a prostitute whose knees have been broken by a man with a baseball bat. I take her by the hand and take her home with me, wash her body and her crushed limbs, her sore-covered feet. I try to absorb her fever in my touch, lay her down to sleep in my bed.

In the morning when I wake, she is gone,
only a cool, clear light shining on the tumbled sheets.

Tonight, I’ll turn the pages of the book again my hands inside the spine, reading the places where memory doesn’t work.

***

Scordatura

The posturing glitterati
at the art gallery
chatter in front of Edvard Munch’s sick children suffering men and women agonized souls.

The air becomes cloying;
we escape gasping
into the night.

In Duthie’s Books we browse through new releases
bell hooks’
The Wounds of Passion: A Writing Life.
I am drawn to it wanting words for my poet self but the cover image burns hands scored with stigmata
patio, the root of passion, meaning suffering.
We step back into the street
through the crush of people to find a busker
fingerless gloves plucking beauty
on a bandura
the strains of Pachelbel’s Canon are made new his hands opening harp strings
into the air.

The night stills,
through time’s disordered architecture
spilling over history’s fragile dams as I remember meeting you in the brink of my soul’s winter when you gave me the smoke of your breath in the long night
the stars emptying such clear light in you such clear light
love’s sonata carving music
across the sky.

***

English Education

In the grey concrete classroom,
fluorescent lights glaring,
Carla submits her assignment,
hands wrapped around a cream box
of handmade Japanese paper, bound with gold cord
inside, texts on sheets of vellum transparent overlays, text printed in red words by women writers Nicole Brossard, Jeannete Winterson, Minnie Bruce Pratt
Sylvia Plath, Barbara Kingsolver, Adrienne Rich.

Under the words, photos of women’s body parts, subversions contained, disrupted.

She titles her assignment Woman Boxed.

Carla teaches me to breathe,
spaces in my lungs opening her texts, her red ink ruptures
her words my touchstones
the surprise of it
sweet teaching.

***
Sun streaming across classroom desks. Textbooks splayed open. I have assigned a quote from the text, asking for response to the list of qualities essential for the effective teacher of literature. The book tells my students that they must be risk-takers, subversive, that they must read gladly and openly, for this is their best hope of introducing others to literature. We use the book’s language, critical thinking, socio-political thought, the English teacher as subversive.

Chalk dust powders my hands, the walls echo loud chatter until Luz reads her response:

During the civil war in El Salvador in the 1980s it was not unusual to find teachers of literature hanging from trees.

The room weeps. My spine slips, throat closes. In this classroom, the dark fields of history loom, edgelit with outrage and the knowledge that language is always culpable.

Textbooks are momentarily discarded.

***
A Klee painting named “Angelus Novus” shows an angel looking as though he is about to move away from something he is fixedly contemplating. This is how one perceives the angel of history. His face is turned toward the past. Where we perceive a chain of events, he sees one catastrophe which keeps piling wreckage and hurls it in front of his feet. The angel would like to stay, awaken the dead, and make whole what has been smashed. But a storm is blowing in from Paradise: it has got caught in his wings with such violence that the angel can no longer close them. The storm irresistibly propels him into the future to which his back is turned, while the pile of debris before him grows skyward.

Walter Benjamin, “Theses on the Philosophy of History,” IX
Angelus Novus

Glorious autumnal skies. Cathedrals of light.
First day of classes at the university.
In another city an uncertain wind howls into dissonance.
It is not the faces of my students I remember that day, but the sheer and immense futility of speech. My words stones in my throat. How to teach about literature, about poetry, when the book opens to such a page, blackened by the charred wings of the angel of history.

After this eleventh day in September, there are those fashioning crosses from twigs, praying to angels with persistence.
It is not the faces of the victims that haunt me, nor the ruined avenues, or the steel towers in flame. Not the widows’ anguish. Not the violinist on the front page of the newspaper, tears streaming down her face as she plays a fugue. Not the powdered bone or seared flesh, not the face of hatred.

It is the shoes that I remember, the shoes that haunt me, falling everywhere like rain from the towers, people running out of their shoes, rows of fireman’s boots abandoned, a woman’s high heel, everywhere shoes in that smoldering ash, full lives still hissing O remember me I walked here. This speech of common steps propelling us into the future.

I have no words for this, no speech for my students in the world’s hours of occlusion. What can I say — that darkness reveals beauty?
That terror will yield beauty and clear-sightedness? I cannot stand at a lectern—professing. I can say nothing.

Yet I stand with them in classrooms day after day, trying to write a new page with them. Something that recalls beauty to the mortal, the imperfect, the guilty. Something that speaks of stars falling on the city. Something that is dream-cut, embossed onto cream-laid papers, my poem for them, born of remembrances of those ashen footprints vanishing from the air.
Something that would allow us all to die in full desire.

Something that would calm the stormwinds blowing in from Paradise.
Something that would heal those scorched wings, allow the angel to close them, fold them gently back into the dark waters of our hearts.

***
Somewhere, a woman is writing a poem
in the twilight hours of history, lavender turning to ash, as time spills over and the moon unfurls her white-pitched fever in the songs of jasmine winds. The young woman I was climbs the stairs, the moon’s pale alphabet filling her. She tucks her child into bed, bends over her desk in the yellow lamplight, frees her hand to write, breaking through the page like that Dorothea Tanning painting where the artist’s hand gashes through the canvas, fingers and wrist plunged to the bone. She writes a dark, erotic psalm, an elegy, a poem to grow old in, a poem to die in.

Somewhere, a woman is writing a poem,
as she gives away the clothes of her dead loved ones,
stretching crumpled wings, her words rise liquid in the air, rosaries of prayer for the dying children, for the ones who have disappeared, the desaparecido, and for the ones who have been murdered. She writes through the taste of fear and rage and fury. She writes in milk and blood, her ink fierce and iridescent, rooted in love. Somewhere, a woman who thought she could say nothing is writing a poem and she will sing forever, blooming in the dark madness of the world.

***
The Lost Language of Cranes

I

For if Hiroshima in the morning, after the bomb has fallen,
Is like a dream, one must ask whose dream it is.

Peter Schwenger, Letter Bomb: Nuclear Holocaust and the Exploding Word Reading with my daughter
the story of Sadako and the Thousand Cranes.
Rachel loves to tell the story of the little Japanese girl who is almost two when the bomb explodes a mile from her home in Hiroshima.

They run, fleeing to the banks of the River Ota drenched by the black rain, falling, falling.

When she is twelve years old,
Sadako runs like the wind in school relay races best runner in the sixth grade, until she falters her body gnawed away by leukemia,
Atomic Bomb Disease.

In the hospital, her friends remind her of the Tsuru, the crane
Japanese symbol of long life, of hope.

If you fold a thousand cranes.
they will protect you from illness,
grant you a wish.

Sadako tells the cranes
I will write peace on your wings
and you will fly all over the world

Sadako begins folding,
folding fragments of newspapers,
discarded wrappers from her medicines,
making tiny paper cranes,
folding, folding

Sadako’s mother writes:
If she has to suffer like this,
she should have died that morning
on August 6th.

She watches her daughter, her painstaking folding.
She buys a bolt of silk fabric printed with cherry blossoms,
makes a kimono to enfold her child.

Sadako’s small fingers folding,
folding day after day.
She makes 644 cranes before she dies.
Her classmates complete her thousand cranes,
place them in her coffin,
as if her heart would continue to beat in the paper wings.

Her mother wraps her daughter in the softness of silk,
in the cherry blossom kimono,

lays flowers in the coffin with the birds, so that her child can bring them with her to the next world.

Sadako’s mother asks the birds:
Why didn’t you sing? Why didn’t you fly?
II

_A cemetery seen from the air is a child’s city._
Carolyn Forché, “The Garden Shukkei-en”

I watch my daughter and her friends folding tiny origami cranes for their class project, winged symbols of peace, spread rainbow-hued across the kitchen table.

The paper birds criss-cross the earth
    correspondences for peace projects, their hopeful wings trying to speak the horrors of war amidst the cheery optimism of chalkboards and classrooms.

The children will send the paper cranes in garlands of a hundred birds each to the mayor of Hiroshima, to be placed with millions of paper cranes at the foot of the Children’s Monument where the stone figure of Sadako holds a large golden crane above her head, arms outstretched to the sky.

I watch my children play and wonder if the power of birds will stand strong against exploding words and mushroom clouds against the screams that reverberate
    in the silence of Hiroshima’s Peace Park.
III

After I noticed the flash, white clouds spread over the blue sky.
It was as if blue morning glories had suddenly bloomed...
Testimony of Isao Kita

By the banks of the river Ota,
where Sadako used to play in the Garden Shukkei-en, stands a stone angel holding an origami crane.

Hibakusha, survivors who are still alive wander the garden, across the pond on the Kokoukyo Bridge, through tea ceremonies and the blossomings of plums and cherries and irises.

In the garden, the silence,
the insistence of memory, the flash of light,
the burning heat, the shattering of glass, everywhere the cries of children calling for their mothers.

Bodies stripped naked by the blast, skin peeling, hanging from fingertips like cloth, mothers holding dying children in their arms, trying in vain to pluck away

c. Language and Literacy. 2004. 6(1). www.educ.queensu.ca/~landl the swarming maggots.

Bones in rice bowls, babies crawling over dead mothers, rooting for nipples, seeking milk, their reflections shimmering like ghosts.

Against a clear blue sky, flames of fire and then black sticky rain

falling, falling on trees, on flowers, on rooftops, on people, the world turning so black it could not be washed off.
Outside my house the morning sun spills,  gilded ripples across the bay.
The cranes stilt across the mudflats.
I wonder what they know, what we have lost,  these birds that mate for life.

Sometimes in the shallow waters of these wetlands,  the cranes dance, sending waves flying, a language of ancient memories,  a language that teaches us that after grief, it is possible to love again,  a music we have forgotten, such sheer joy.

When the cranes lift in ascent, cathedrals of wind  rise in their wingbones, estuaries of morning light lifting across continents,  a white front of radiance,  their cries like clouds of desire.

After, in the presence of still waters,  you can rest in the white light, in the grace of wings.

---

"The Lost Language of Cranes III"  Suzanne Northcott

***
What kind of nation is this
Deleting love from its curriculum
The art of poetry
The mystery of women’s eyes
What kind of nation is this
Battling each rain cloud…
Nizar Kabbani

For beauty is nothing
But the beginning of terror,
Which we still are just able to endure,
And we are so awed because it serenely disdains
To annihilate us…
Rainier Maria Rilke, “The Duino Elegies”
Manifesto

Amidst its provocations, what does this art make possible?

It makes it possible, in the poet’s notebooks and beyond, to imagine this curriculum vitae, the course of a life that becomes poetry. This poem is a location for the beautiful, for convulsive beauty, the surrealist manifesto in which oppositional forces reside alongside each other. Beauty that is often difficult, falling just short of fear. The beauty of the world is found edged with the scar tissue of history, a cicatrix that knows the borderlines of terror. Yet, amidst the dark fields of history, the embrace of beauty can be education. This beauty is found in our constant revision and interrogation of our own positions in relation to others, so that our minds and hearts and empathies are opened to others. This is what poetry proposes: love, beauty, knowledge, faith, testaments for living alongside terror. Beauty and terror hand in hand in our own desires and daily lives. We endure this. Poetry confronts terror, makes it habitable knowledge, beautiful.

This art makes it possible to imagine a curriculum phrased as a gift to a newborn. A deep song that begins and ends with the word love. To make this poem, cradle it in our hands. It will end with the word love, a true sentence for greeting a newborn. A lullaby. The art of it, knowledge. Human, imperfect, guilty. Beauty as the evocation and re-evocation of promise. Possible beauty.

***
Notes for the Reader

Art by Suzanne Northcott from The Body of My Garden, a collaborative exhibition and poetry reading with Rishma Dunlop that opened at the Linda Lando Fine Art Gallery, Vancouver, Oct. 24-Nov. 2, 2002. Northcott’s art formed a response to and artistic dialogue with Dunlop’s collection of poems The Body of My Garden, Mansfield Press, Toronto, 2002. Suzanne Northcott and Rishma Dunlop continue to work across the genres of literary text and visual art in aesthetic inquiry and collaborative artistic production. The art from The Body of My Garden exhibition can be viewed at www.lindalandofineart.com and www.suzannenorthcott.com. See also the collaboration on “Copper Moon: Poem for Matthew Shepard” at: Dunlop, R. (April 2003). “Copper Moon.” Educational Insights, 8(1). http://www.csci.educ.ubc.ca/publication/insights/v08n01/poeticpause/dunlop/coppermoon.html

Notebook 1
Notes to Open a Memory Chamber: Scar Tissue, Testimony, Beauty

Art by Suzanne Northcott: “Tourniquet,” 18”x18,”mixed media on canvas.

The citation from Adrienne Rich’s poem “Inscriptions is from The Dark Fields of the Republic: Poems 1991-1995. New York: W.W. Norton, 1995.

“Cartography.” (Dunlop, R. 2003). Windsor Review: An International Journal of Life, Literature and the Arts. Vol 36, No.1, Spring 2003, p. 14.

Notebook 2
Lector in Fabula: New Literacies

Art by Suzanne Northcott, “Vespers,” 24”x24,” photo on wood.

“The title of this poem is borrowed from Umberto Eco’s book Lector in Fabula, (1979). Milano: Bompiani. The title is translated as The Reader in the Story. Eco’s theoretical discussions consider the role of the reader as active agent in the construction and imagination of an author’s text.

The poems “Vespers,” and “Scordatura” are reprinted from Dunlop, R. (2002). The Body of My Garden. Toronto, Mansfield Press, with permission of the author and the publisher.

“Scordatura.” The title refers to the mistuning or alternate tuning of a string instrument to achieve unconventional sonorities and chords. Often used in 18th century music in notations for the viola d’amore.

“English Education” is for Carla Mancini.

“Strange Fruit” is for Luz Minero.

Notebook 3
Angelus Novus

Art by Suzanne Northcott: “Holding Space,” 48”x 60,” acrylic and graphite on canvas.

Epigraph by Walter Benjamin is from “Theses on the Philosophy of History” Part IX, in Illuminations, edited and translated by Hannah Arendt. New York: Schocken Books, pp.257-258.
Notebook 4
The Lost Language of Cranes

Art by Suzanne Northcott.

Section I:
“The Lost Language of Cranes II,” 24”x 24” mixed media on wood.
“The Lost language of Cranes I,” (detail) 12” x 48,” mixed media on wood.

Epigraph by Peter Schwenger from Letter Bomb. Nuclear Holocaust and The Exploding Word. John Hopkins University Press, 1992. Cited in Carolyn Forché’s The Angel Of History, New York: HarperCollins, 1994, p.72.

Section II
“The Lost Language of Cranes I,” (detail) 12” x 48,” mixed media on wood.

Section III
“The Lost Language of Cranes I,” (detail) 12” x 48,” mixed media on wood.

Section IV
“The Lost Language of Cranes III,” 12” x 48,” mixed media on wood.

“The Lost Language of Cranes.” An earlier version of this poem appeared in JCT, Journal of Curriculum Theorizing, Vol.18, No.1, Spring 2002, pp.109-115. Segments of this poem were inspired and informed by Carolyn Forché’s poems, “The Garden of Shukkei-en,” and “Testimony of Light” in her collection The Angel of History, New York: HarperCollins, 1994.

Hibakusha: The first atomic bomb used in wartime was dropped in Hiroshima on August 6, 1945, killing between 130,000 and 150,000 people by the end of that year. The term hibakusha refers to survivors of the Atomic Bomb. Those who survived the bombing are aging rapidly now after struggling for many years. Segments of this poem are informed by the testimonies collected and videotaped by the Hiroshima Peace and Culture Foundation to commemorate the International year of Peace in 1986.

Excerpts referring to Sadako Sasaki’s mother, Fujiko Sasaki, are based on a letter titled, “Come Back to Me Sadako,” from Record of Atomic Bombs in Japan by Seishi Toyota, Nihon Tosho Center, 1991.

When Sadako died on October 25, 1955, her classmates folded the missing paper cranes to make a thousand and placed them in the coffin with Sadako’s body. Since then the paper crane has become an international symbol of nuclear disarmament.

Sadako’s friends and classmates collected Sadako’s letters and writings and published them under the title Kokeshi, after the name of a doll they had given Sadako in the hospital. Inspired by this collection and the remarkable effect Sadako’s story had on others, Eleanor Coerr wrote the powerful book, Sadako and the Thousand Paper Cranes, published by G.P. Putnam in 1993.

Sadako’s classmates began a national campaign to build a monument in her memory. It was built to honor all children who suffered from the devastating consequences and effects of the atomic bomb. The Statue of Sadako is also known as The Children’s Monument. Built in 1958 with donations from school children, the monument stands in the center of Hiroshima’s Peace Park surrounded by thousands of paper cranes from people all over the world. At its base is a plaque with the following inscription:

This is our cry
This is our prayer
Peace in the world
Notebook 5: Curriculum, Beauty, Words to Greet a Newborn

Art by Suzanne Northcott: Detail from “Copper Moon,” 18” x 48,” acrylic and phototransfer on wood.

“Somewhere a woman is writing a poem” was first published in Educational Insights, Vol.7, No.2, 2002. www.csci.educ.ubc.ca/ publication/insights/v07n02/contextualexplorations/dunlop/

Citation by Nizar Kabbani is from Republic of Love, translated by Nayef Alkalali. London: Kegan Paul International, 2002. Cited as an epigraph to Joy Harjo’s book of poems How We Became Human. New York: WW. Norton, 2002.

Citation by Rainier Maria Rilke is from “The Duino Elegies,” in The Selected Poetry of Rainier Maria Rilke, edited and translated by Stephen Mitchell. New York: Vintage, 1989, p. 151.

Abstract

Lecteur de fable: Le cahier de notes du poète
Rishma Dunlop, Université York

Dans cet article, l’auteur explore les notions d’alphabétisation nouvelles et critiques. Se rappelant le livre d’Umberto Eco Lector in Fabula (le lecteur dans l’histoire), le lecteur est considéré comme un agent actif dans la construction et l’imagination de textes, invité dans un processus de coopération d’interprétation quand l’histoire de “l’autre” est lu. L’élaboration de théories et la conceptualisation à propos de la lecture, écriture, l’enseignement, et les interconnections d’alphabétisation avec des souvenirs et déclarations historiques sont explorés. La formule cahier de notes, textes poétiques, et l’interaction avec l’art visuel créé un texte à plusieurs niveaux, une requête qui utilise une “poiesis”historiographique, la création d’art comme réponse aux événements culturels. Le “Manifesto” culminant, une formule utilisé historiquement par les activistes, politiciens, théoristes, artistes, et mouvement de résistance, devient un appel à l’action, une innovation pour considérer les possibilités de l’art comme agent d’éducation de justice sociale pour l’action et les pensées d’ethique.

In this article, the author explores notions of critical and new literacies. Recalling Umberto Eco’s book Lector in Fabula (the reader in the story), the reader is considered an active agent in the construction and imagination of texts, invited into a process of interpretive cooperation as the story of the “other” is read. Theorizing and conceptualizing about reading, writing, teaching, and interconnections of literacy with historical remembrance and testimony are explored. The notebook form, poetic texts, and interplay with visual art create a multi-layered text, an inquiry that employs historiographic poiesis, artmaking as a response to curricular and historical events. The culminating “Manifesto,” a form historically used by activists, politicians, theorists, artists, and resistance movements, becomes a call to action, an invitation to consider the possibilities of art as an agent of social justice education for ethical thought and action.

c. Language and Literacy. 2004. 6(1). www.educ.queensu.ca/~landl
About the Author

Rishma Dunlop is a professor of Language and Literary Studies in the Faculty of Education at York University, Toronto. Her research interests include literary theory, fine arts cultural studies, literature and art of witness, ethics and social justice education. Current research projects include work on Testimony, History and Memory, an exploration of the engagement with literature and the arts for human rights and social justice education. Her ongoing collaborations with visual artists include exhibitions of literary texts and art, collaborative publications and performances. She is the founder of a research collective of women artists/researchers called The Red Shoes Collective. Rishma Dunlop is a poet and fiction writer whose work has won awards and has appeared in numerous books and journals. She is the author of two volumes of poetry, Boundary Bay, (1999, Staccato/Turnstone Press) and The Body of My Garden (2002, Mansfield Press). She has recently completed a new manuscript titled Slow Burn.

Email: rdunlop@edu.yorku.ca

About the Artist

Suzanne Northcott lives in the historic village of Fort Langley, B.C. Her work ranges from contemporary figurative to abstraction. Her work revolves around an exploration of the nature of boundaries and what lies between: between self and other, the material and the subconscious world, or the space between disparate places. She works mainly in acrylic on wood or canvas, sometimes in combination with drawing media and photo-transfer. A senior member of the Federation of Canadian Artists, Suzanne Northcott teaches creative process and life drawing in British Columbia and across Canada. She has guest lectured at Capilano College, University College of the Fraser Valley, The University of British Columbia and York University. Her work is widely collected and her awards include the prestigious Aim for Arts International Show and this year's Spilsbury bronze medal. Her ongoing collaboration with poet Rishma Dunlop is a continuation of her fascination with words and image and follows an earlier project "The Sex Lives of Vegetables," with poet Lorna Crozier.

Email: suzannenorthcott@shaw.ca
www.suzannenorthcott.com