Abstract: This paper discusses the healing practices of samayācāra Śrīvidyā, a Hindu Tantric tradition. This study is based on field research conducted in the Śrī Lalitāmbikā temple in Coimbatore, India. The tradition not only advocates inner ritualism, but also focuses on healing practices derived from Tantric sources. By using both emic and etic approaches, this paper attempts to show how the rituals and Śrīvidyā meditative practices became incorporated into this system of healing and well-being. A further aim of this paper is to indicate how various forms of embodiment and healing define the spiritual practice of Lalitāmbikā Śrīvidyā.

Keywords: Śrīvidyā; Tantra; healing; embodied knowledge; experience

1. Introduction

Śrīvidyā is a Hindu esoteric (Tantric) tradition centered on the worship of the goddess Tripurasundarī, and her arcane diagram Śrīcakra, which is believed to represent powers of the universe. The main aim of this study is to indicate how the Tantric rituals and meditations of Śrīvidyā have been integrated into the system taught at the Śrī Lalitāmbikā temple, also known as the Samayācāra Śrīvidyā Healing and Wellbeing Centre.

In his study on African religions, Janzen (1992) observes that the distinction between religion and healing is irrelevant from the perspective of the followers of the African cults. Thus, “by entering African religious and therapeutic expression through its own language” Janzen tries to investigate the meaning of healing practices in the context of the tradition. Similarly, this study here presents Tantric practitioners’ views on and definitions of spiritual therapeutics to show the close connections between religion, ritual activity, health, and illness. Hence, this paper argues that the inner ritualism of Tantra and health matters are inextricably interwoven.

This paper focuses on the healing practices of Śrīvidyā and shows how external rites (bāhya pūjās) have been internalized in the samayācāra lineage of this tradition. Tantric healing consists primarily of invoking selected deities to one’s body, blocking or disintegrating negative energies with the power of mantras, and transforming “self-awareness, hitherto confined within the body, to the cosmic awareness that embraces the totality” (Timalsina 2012b). In what follows, I intend to contextualize Tantric healing practices by applying an emic perspective to a living tradition of Śrīvidyā. This study is based on participant observations of the rituals of Śrīvidyā Samayācāra of the Śrī Lalitāmbikā temple in Coimbatore, India. Joining the community and participating in their religious activities—that is, engaging in active participation (Spradley 1980, p. 62)—allowed me to simultaneously observe and experience the documented practices. This insider’s perspective on the rites is compared with Śrīvidyā ritualism introduced in the authoritative scriptures of this tradition. Thus, this study addresses the lack of ethnographically informed perspectives on Tantric traditions, while comparing the ethnographic data with orthopraxis known from textual sources.
2. Śrīvidyā: A Tantric Tradition of the Goddess Tripurā

The followers of Śrīvidyā worship a goddess called Tripurasundarī (the Beautiful One of the Three Worlds), Lalitā (the Playful One) or Kāmeśvari (the Goddess of Erotic Desire). In the older form of this tradition, the goddess was worshipped together with Kāmadeva (the God of Erotic Desire) and a retinue of female spirits (Golovkova 2020). However, in time, this esoteric cult morphed into a complex system of spiritual practices aimed at the realization of non-duality.

The tradition proclaims that the goddess emits and sustains the three worlds of Hindu cosmology (Golovkova 2020). She is also worshipped in three forms. Tripurā’s first is her coarse (sthūla) form, that is, her iconographic depiction as a 16-year-old girl, playful and passionate. Her second, subtle (sūksma) form is that of the śrīcakra, a ritualistic tool (yantra), which contain her potencies. The nine interlocking triangles of the yantra depict the sequences of the emanation and resorption of reality from and into a central point (bindu), which contains them all in an unmanifested form. Śrīcakra is therefore perceived as a map of reality and a labyrinth of the universe. The third and most subtle (atiśūksma) form of this goddess is her mantra, the Śrī-vidyā (auspicious wisdom), which, in her most secret form, has 16 syllables and is therefore called Śoḍaṣā. The mantra is traditionally divided into three segments (kūta) that, in turn, are correlated with triple powers and manifestations of the goddess.

According to historians, Śrīvidyā was a cult that developed in Kashmir through incorporating the ritualistic elements of Kashmirian Śaivism (Trika) and later gained popularity in South Indian states (Wallis 2014, p. 105). Golovkova (2019) indicates that Vāmakaśeṣvaratmata and other early texts of Śrīvidyā showed little interest in practices aimed at salvation, and focused instead on empowerment and wish-fulfilling rites. In contrast, the later Yoginihrdaya elaborated on the soteriological meaning of rituals and focused on the internalized, meditative techniques dedicated to the realization of liberation during one’s lifetime (jīvanmukti).

In modern South India, there are many Tantric practitioners who consider Śrīvidyā gnosīs as the most secret aspect of their revelation (Karasinski 2020). These Tantric groups advocate the Kaula way of conduct (Kaulācāra), with meditations, inner ritual practice (antar-yāga), complemented with external rites (bahir-yāgas) and offerings of wine, flesh and other substances forbidden in orthodox Brahmin traditions (Lawrence 1998, p. 592). However, there are also Śrīvidyā lineages that follow the Samaya way of conduct (Samayācāra). The followers of Samayācāra abstain from the transgressive offerings and complex ritualism and focus on antar-yāga and yoga (Golovkova 2019). A Vedānta-Tantra syncretism can also be found in the practices of the Śaṅkarācāryas of Śringeri and the Śmārta-Śaiva Brahmins of South India (Wilke 2005). Śrīvidyā can be considered as a vehicle through which Sanskrit scholars of the above stated lineage transformed the cultural norms and integrated South Indian communities of Brahmins (Fisher 2012).

Both Kaula and Samaya Śrīvidyā traditions are found in various parts of India and their spiritual practices have also gained considerable popularity among devotees in other parts of the world. An indication of how widespread the tradition is around the world can be found in Dempsey (2006) study of Śrī Rājarājeśvarī Pītha in Upstate New York, Bowden (2017) biography of the guru Amrтанanda of Andhra Pradesh, and Lidke (2017) monograph on Śrīvidyā in Nepal.

This paper discusses Śrīvidyā in the context of spiritual healing and embodiment. I argue that the tradition of Lalitāmbikā temple focuses on healing practices derived from Tantric sources. This study shows also how various forms of embodiment and healing define the spiritual practice of this tradition.

3. The Embodiment and Hierophany: The Story of Swami Jagannatha and the Lalitāmbikā Temple

I first heard about the Lalitāmbikā temple during my field research on Tantric traditions in Kerala in 2012. At that time, I learned from my Tantric informants about a Śrīvidyā festival (mahotsava) at the Lalitāmbikā temple of the nearby Coimbatore. The informants introduced the temple as a center of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā that focuses on internal rituals and healing. Hence, I decided to participate in their event to learn more about that tradition and to research their spiritual therapeutics.

The main priest and the founder of the Lalitāmbikā temple introduces himself as Jagannatha Swami. The Swami is a Śrīvidyā guru, an academician, astrologer, and an ardent follower of Advaita Vedānta, a classic non-dualistic school of Indian philosophy. Reflecting on his spiritual journey, Swami admits:

Vedānta is the central philosophy of Śrīvidyā. Śrīvidyā meditation is like a post graduate course in spirituality. To meditate, one needs to understand that the soul and the divine are one and the same. The soul does not have any centre, it occupies the whole body. The movement of this soul is fundamental to life. The mind, intellect and ego follow its movement.

Swami started his spiritual quest in 1992, when he received a Śrīvidyā initiation from Śrī Balasubrahmanya Sivacarya, a guru from the lineage of a famous Tantric master, Bhāskararāya. During his early days of spiritual training, Jagannatha Swami led the life of a solitary yogi, mendicant, and astrologer. In his search for spiritual knowledge, he embarked on many pilgrimages to holy places in South India. He visited, for instance, Sabarimala, a famous Ayyappan temple in Kerala. Ayyappan is a Keralan celibate deity, a son of two male gods, who gained his legendary powers from ascetic practices (Osella and Osella 2003, p. 729). During his arduous treks to that mountain temple, hidden in the Pathanamthitta forest, Swami received additional spiritual insights into the Śrīvidyā lore from Brahmins and monks who lived there.

Swami dedicated his life to the study of Vedic philosophy and Tantric ritualism. He learned from yogis and academicians. In time, he gained considerable fame as an expert-practitioner and received a doctorate degree in philosophy. In 1995, prompted by divine visions, Swami decided to build a temple for Lalitāmbikā, the Goddess of Śrīvidyā in her form of Universal Mother. In 1997, he received a donation of land and started building the sanctum sanctorum. According to tradition, the place was a meeting ground for ancient sages, who had long since cast away their material bodies and continued to live in their spiritual forms. The land was therefore considered to be a living entity, imbued with spiritual meaning and divine powers. Due to various obstacles, the building process suddenly stopped a year later, in 1998. After consultations and astrological enquiries, it was discovered that the land once belonged to a hermit and devotee of a Hindu god, Śrī Lakṣmī Narasimha. Thus, the astrologers recommended building a shrine for this deity. Finally, the temple complex was erected with shrines for Lalitā, Mahalakṣmī, Sarasvatī, Lakṣmī Narasimha and Śiva. The temple construction was completed in three years and was consecrated in the year 2000.

Interestingly, the story about a guru who receives divine inspiration to erect a temple and restore an ancient sacred site is a common motif in the hagiographies of many Śrīvidyā masters. Thus, for instance, spiritual visions led to another contemporary Śrīvidyā guru, Swami Amrtananda, a former nuclear physicist, leaving his scientific research and retreating into the remote forest of Andhra Pradesh. There, according to his biography, the goddess prompted him to find and rebuild an ancient Tantric temple. The new temple, consecrated in 1994, soon attracted crowds of followers from India and abroad, becoming an important Śrīvidyā center called Devipuram (Bowden 2017). Similarly, another Tantric guru of the Kaula Śrīvidyā path, whom I met in Kannur (Kerala), told me about his discovery of an ancient shrine when he was rebuilding his ancestral temples. He was led to the sacred place by dream visions and divine appearances. Hence, the discovering and rebuilding of an ancient temple appears to be an act of re-establishing the continuity of the Śrīvidyā tradition. These “reconsecrated” holy grounds become places of learning, healing and hierophany, a manifestation of the sacred realities (Eliade 1987, p. 11). Moreover, temples like Lalitāmbikā, were designed according to the visions of gurus and therefore embody their transcendental or spiritual experiences.
4. Let the Gods Dwell in My Body: The Scheme of Religious Therapeutics in Śrīvidyā

Studies on religious therapeutics usually take into consideration the various relations between health, healing, embodiment and spirituality. Here, in line with Fields (1961, pp. 2–3) definition, I use the term the “religious therapeutics” of Śrīvidyā to designate specific principles and practices of the tradition that focus on healing. The religious therapeutics in this context include healing practices that are performed to improve both psychophysical and spiritual health. I wish to stress that the Samayācāra Śrīvidyā of Lalitāmbikā is a tradition that defines itself through its orientation toward healing and wellness. Hence, I attempt to examine the tradition from the perspective of its therapeutic impetus and indicate how the concepts of “embodiment” and “healing” function in the spiritual practices of this tradition.

Fields (1961, p. 6) observes that the yogic path deals with psychophysical health but its healing practices are oriented toward liberation understood as the “actualization of unobstructed self-identity, and, consequently, the elimination of suffering”. Thus, he indicates two aspects of healing in spiritual traditions: (1) healing as the improvement of physical and psychological health; and (2) liberation as healing in an ultimate sense. In this paper, I discuss both aspects of healing practices in the Samayācāra Lalitāmbikā tradition but stress the importance of liberation as the goal of Śrīvidyā spiritual practice and healing par excellence.

In the words of the Swami, the Śrīvidyā tradition is a “harmonious blend of all paths of spirituality”, a samarasa—mārga. In fact, the term can be traced back to the philosophy of Trika Śaivism of Kashmir. According to the Kashmirian Śaiva tradition, when an enlightened yogi realizes the non-duality of the universe, they experience absolute freedom, spontaneity, and an infiniteness of all-pervading consciousness. One of the terms used to describe this state was samarasya, that is, having the same flavor (Muller-Ortega 1997, p. 52). Hence, samarasa mārga can be translated as a path leading to the experience of that state. However, the Swami adds that even though this path leads one to enlightenment, it also improves one’s physical and mental health. He insists that Śrīvidyā promises svatantrya, absolute freedom from illusions of duality (māya), the very cause of human suffering. In the Samayācāra Śrīvidyā tradition of Lalitāmbikā, the disease is either psycho-somatic or spirito-somatic, and the spiritual advancement eradicates the root cause of the ailment, that is, māya. According to the Swami, the highest, liberating knowledge that grants svatantrya is equivalent to Brahmajñāna (the realization of Brahman) of Vedānta. Thus, to realize oneness with Brahman, the ultimate reality, one should—to quote Coward (2008, p. 132)—“enter into fully perfected human life of eternal freedom”. The spiritual realization is said to cure all the suffering caused by the ephemerality of the material world. Seligman (2010, p. 297), in a study on medical anthropology, observes that suffering may potentially “undermine the coherence of lived selves” and cause “internal conflict, disjunction, or fragmentation”. Conversely, the adepts of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā undergo a Tantra-yoga training to forsake the feeling of disjunction and to attain the state of divine non-duality. According to the Hindu tradition, this experience of perfect unity with the divine in the midst of apparent (illusory) duality of the world brings about a feeling of “fullness” (pūrnatva) (Mann 1984, p. 172).

The Śrīvidyā of Lalitāmbikā is a spiritual school that advocates Vedānta philosophy, but also proposing Tantric methods to access the Brahmajñāna. The adepts are told to approach the divine in a fourfold manner: through the external worship of the idols of Mother Goddesses, the rituals of śrīcakra, kundalini yoga, and mantra practice. All these acts are interlinked and together constitute the basic syntax of Lalitāmbikā Samayācāra orthopraxy.

Kundalini yoga and Śrīvidyā meditation activate nine cakras, energy centers of the human body that correspond to the enclosures of śrīcakra. In all the practices, śrīcakra is the main tool and the point of reference. The adepts believe that in the process of invoking gods and goddesses to the bodily cakras and visualizing them as the enclosure (āvarana) of śrīcakra, one’s body is deified and empowered with the divine forces. For the believers, śrīcakra represents the powers of both microcosm (body) and macrocosm.
(universe). Šrīcakra also functions as a visual representation of the goddess. Conversely, mantras are her sonic forms and the auditory equivalents of šrīcakra. In what follows, I wish to discuss the spiritual practice of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā and indicate how the abovementioned elements function in the system of healing.

5. Šrīcakra and the Embodied Universe

As observed by Timalsina (2015, p. 52), Tantric practice relies on creating and manipulating images or visions. Many rituals and meditations require an adept to imagine, create or contemplate a visual form of a deity or symbolic structures like yantras. Šrīcakra of Śrīvidyā, arguably the most famous sacred image of Tantric Hinduism, is a visual representation of the processes of creating and dissolving the universe. It is therefore worshipped as the divine structure of the world. Šrīcakra consists of nine enclosures identified with mystical powers to be gained and, paradoxically, obstacles that need to be removed through their spiritual practice. (Bafna 2000). The outermost gateways of śrīcakra take the form of three parallel lines, with its openings called doorways (dvāra). Therefore, a person performing a śrīcakra rite (or meditating upon śrīcakra) is virtually entering the universe of the yantra. Entering into the Šrīcakra can be seen as finding shelter from ailments of the external world, but also leads to the realization of the complexity of the universe and its powers. Lākṣmīdhara, one of the first historical proponents of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā, defines the main goal of Samayācāra as the interior worship of the śrīcakra, a yantra that leads one through its labyrinthine enclosures and at the same time induces the adept’s inner energy to travel through bodily cakras: from the lowest mūlādhāra to the thousand-petalled lotus of brāhmaṇḍa (Wilke 2012, p. 46) (Figure 1).11

In the scriptures of Śrīvidyā (e.g., Varṇasyātrasahas 2.92), the section on bhūtpura is called the Wheel Enchanting the Three Worlds (trayilokamohanačakra). If śrīcakra is visualized in its three-dimensional form (meru śrīcakra), two more openings can be seen, and this group of six doorways corresponds to six cakras located in the body of the practitioner (Figure 2). Conversely, the inner most cakra, the “Wheel of All Bliss” (Sarvānandamaya cakra) is the final resting place of the soul that finds liberation beyond time and space. Before one can reach that wheel, one needs to pass other enclosures that include Sarvarogahara cakra.
and Sarvarakṣākara cakra, the “Wheel Removing All Diseases” and “Wheel of Complete Protection”. In the healing practices of Lalitāmbikā, Sarvarogahara cakra is also mentally removed from śrīcakra and visualized within one’s body or the body of a patient. Afterward, the afflicted parts of the body are mentally cleansed and energized with the powers of the goddesses that inhabit Sarvarogahara cakra. Sarvarakṣākara cakra is used in a similar fashion in meditations of protection. Conversely, a person meditating on Sarvānandamaya cakra should visualize the other enclosures of śrīcakra, merging and revealing a single reality. Therefore, the journey within śrīcakra leads an adept through various aspects of protection and healing and ultimately takes them beyond these two.

Higgins (2018) observes that a labyrinth is “both a symbol of the body and its fragile mysteries, and a gesture of optimism that a corner of the universe can be mastered and given pattern and order by the human mind”. Therefore, Śrīcakra can be seen as a labyrinth and tool used by the adepts to reorganize their life. In fact, a modern mystic and yogi, Swami Rama (Rama 2007, pp. 187–94), called śrīcakra a “map of the path of eternal return to inner wholeness and perfection”. Additionally, during my research in Uttar Pradesh, I came across yogis initiating adepts into esoteric practices of kundalini yoga. One of the tools used in the initiations was śrīcakra. When questioned about its use, the yogis vehemently denied any affiliation with Śrīvidyā, but described śrīcakra as a “power tool” capable of channeling the kundalini.12

Many concepts represented in śrīcakra are derived from the Kashmirian Śaiva theology that states that the universe is a projection or reflection (pratibimba) of the self-image of the divine (Īśvara-pratyabhijñā-kārīka, 2.4.19). Thus, Śrīcakra is both identical to the divine consciousness and different from it; it is both the very form of reality (rūpa) and its most ideal reflection (bimba). An adept who identifies with Śrīcakra is therefore the reflection and the embodiment of reality.

The ritual of śrīcakra (usually referred to as navāvaraṇa pūjā—a “ritual of nine enclosures”) is a composite procedure for initiated devotees that comprises several lesser rites honoring enclosures of the diagram—intricate enfilades of rooms inhabited by goddesses and their powers. The long litanies of the divine names are inscribed in the labyrinth of śrīcakra—they form a kind of power-cipher that an adept must decode and internalize. This can be performed in two distinct manners: srṣṭi (according to the principle of creation) in Samayācāra or saṁihātra (a way of dissolution) in Kaula. These two differ in their starting point of the adoration: srṣṭi is pursued from the inner part to the outer regions, while saṁihātra is pursued from the outermost enclosures to the central bindu (Brooks 1992, p. 25). In this respect, it is worth quoting Brooks (1992, p. 151), who states that: “the ritual worship of śrīcakra is actually a series of smaller rites that are individually distinguished and combined into a larger pattern of meaning and activity”. The rites consist of invocations of the retinues of goddesses and divine powers located in the enclosures of śrīcakra. During navāvaraṇa pūjā in the Lalitāmbikā temple, the invoked divinities are honored with flowers and food offerings, praised with eulogies in both Sanskrit and Tamil, and visualized as coexisting in both śrīcakra and the body of an adept performing or participating in the rite. As per the testimony of senior students of the Lalitāmbikā temple, an adept’s intimate relationship with the deities of śrīcakra is brought about through the repetition of a series of reverential acts and reiterations of mantras and accompanying ritual gestures.

In the words of Lidke (2016), śrīcakra has a dyadic nature: it is a visual emanation of divinity and a sonic field that constructs the acoustic body of the goddess. Thus, the key element of the ritual is a process of linking these fields by ritually constructing and worshipping śrīcakra in its physical form and in one’s consciousness. The śrīcakra ritual, whether external or mental, is therefore a play between a pure internalized consciousness and the manifested reality.

As stated by the practitioners of Lalitāmbikā Samayācāra, the śrīcakra ritual leads to empowerment, rejuvenation and liberation. Nonetheless, according to the Swami words, the spiritual progress would not be possible without the blessings of guruparamparā, the tradition of gurus into which an adept is initiated at the start of their spiritual practice. In the case of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā, the guruparamparā is a lineage of teachers from Bhāskararāya (c. 1728–50) up to the Swami Jagannatha. The guruparamparā is worshipped in śrīcakra and honored before any ritual practice can commence.

Bhāskararāya Makhin (ca. 1690–1785 CE) is known as a Tantric master, polymath and prolific commentator of Sanskrit works. He is generally considered to be the undisputed authority on the Śrīvidyā, especially in South India. His commentaries touch upon Śrīvidyā and Vedānta philosophies, but also shed light on various aspects of the Śrīvidyā ritualism. Interestingly, in his works, he quotes and paraphrases Vedic and Tantric sources that he interprets in light of Vedāntic non-dualism. His synthesis of Vedic and Tantric theologies opens new dimensions of meanings of Śrīvidyā doctrines. However, as Khanna (2016) rightly points out, while Bhāskararāya provided insight into the inner ritualism and meditation of Śrīvidyā, the complex internalization of śrīcakra and spiritual exercises that connect the yantra with the cakras of the subtle body differ from one lineage to another and have various variants advocated by their respective gurus. In the following paragraphs, I wish to indicate how the aforementioned spiritual practices were adapted by the Lalitāmbikā Samayācāra tradition.

6. Healing through Meditation and the Spiritual Reconstruction of the Body

According to the Lalitāmbikā Samayācāra tradition, an initiated adept can perform Śrīcakra rites only after completing a series of preliminary practices that include mantra-chanting routines and kundalint meditations. These practices are aimed to enhance their physical, mental and spiritual health. Many Tantric practitioner believe that kundalint yoga is “a therapy to treat the immediate bodily and mental distresses of the individual” and lead to the ultimate healing in a form of self-realization” (Farah and Khalsa 2015, p. 395).

The kundalint yoga of the Samayâcâra system comprises the physical practice of postures (âsana), breath control, mantra chanting, and meditation. As in other schools of kundalint yoga, the adepts learn various forms of locks (bandhas) and relaxation techniques that are aimed at regulating the flow of internal energy. The meditation is combined with a mantra practice: adepts invoke divine couples—male and female deities—into the cakras of their body and visualize the flow of internal energy (kundalint). In fact, the mûlâdhâra has Ganapati as its sole patron but higher cakras are inhabited by manifestations of Brahma, Viṣṇu and Śiva with their consorts. Weiss (2009, p. 130) notes that Siddha adepts he interviewed in Tamilnadu meditated on Rudra and Parvati as dwelling in the anûhata cakra and invoked Sadasiva and ManÔnomani into the aîjã cakra. Interestingly, the same deities are praised and invoked in those cakras by the adepts of the Samayâcâra of the Lalitâmbikâ temple. The highest cakra called sahasrâra (Thousand-Petalled Lotus) is subdivided into the guru domain, the domain of gûyatâ and the domain of Tripura-sundari in her form of Sakti—the energy of the universe. The adepts visualize the divinities in their cakras and, by chanting mantras and yogic breath control exercises (prânâyâma), propel their kundalint from mûlâdhâra to sahasrâra. The kundalint pierces all cakras, healing and energizing them, and removing the energy blocks. These blockages are apparently caused by stress, emotional or physical traumas and aggravated by various factors such as toxins and poor living conditions. The inner energy blocks, according to the practitioners of the Lalitâmbikâ temple, may cause a gradual deterioration of health and thus the Samayâcâra meditation is a tool to reprogram the human body to heal itself. During the last stage of Samayâcâra meditation, an adept is instructed to mentally unify all the cakras of their body and meditate on the divine presence in the aîjã (vajra) cakra, while chanting a mûla mantra, a sacred formula they received from their guru.

Similar spiritual exercises are mentioned in Bhûskararâya’s commentary on Lalitâsahasranama (1919: verse 52), the famous eulogy (stotra) praising 1000 epithets of the Lalitâ goddess. The author of this text briefly states that when an initiated adept starts the practice of mahtvedha, by the grace of the preceptor, kundalint rises from the mûlâdhâra and enters the manipûra cakra. There, the aspirant should venerate her with eulogies and mantras. In the process, the kundalint power will move to the anûhata cakra and later to the visûddha cakra, where one should visualize her adored with the luster of the moon. Then, with subsequent spiritual exercises, the adept should elevate the kundalint sakti to their aîjã cakra and to the thousand-petalled lotus. The finale of the meditation is reached when the adept visualizes Šrâcakra and focuses on its central point, while chanting the mûla mantra. In this state, the adept is said to experience the unity of the whole universe. The said mûla mantra, to be chanted in their final stage of meditation, is correlated with an adept’s level of spiritual advancement. The spiritual progress of the adepts is marked by series of initiations when they are given new mantras to chant and use in their meditations. After formal initiation, one is required to follow specific directions from the guru, and these directions underscore the importance of orthopraxis: performing the appropriate mantra at the appropriate time and place. This spiritual journey starts with a mantra known as Šrûvidyâ tritari (aim-hrîm-šrîm). The three syllables are traditionally ascribed to three goddesses: aim—Sarasvatî, hrîm—Durgâ, and šrîm—Lakshmi. Thus, the repetition of the mantra is supposed to attract good fortune (Laksmi), destroy the obstacles (Durgâ), and bring wisdom (Sarasvatî). The hrîm mantra, the Sakti-power syllable, is also used in healing and purification rites. To give just one example, the adepts learn a technique of visualizing problems or negative thoughts in the sahasrâra cakra and dissolving them with a help of the Durgâ mantra. Thus, as described by Padoux (2017, p. 118), the mantra practice of Šrûvidyâ is in fact “a yogic mental and bodily action” that renders the body divine and regulates the internal powers.

Other practices of Samayâcâra also involve manifold nyâsas—the projection of mantras onto the human body. According to the Swami, nyâsas are performed to connect the macrocosm of the universe with the microcosm of the practitioner’s body. Apart from the nyāsas, adepts utilize yogic breath techniques and visualizations to purify their bodies. Indeed, the purification process is conducted through elaborate visualizations of burning, washing and recreating the body. This imaginary destruction and recreation of the body is performed, for instance, during the Śrīcakra ritual and is conducted with specific mantras found in the authoritative scriptures of Śrīvidyā, for instance in Paraśurāma Kalpasūtra (7.6).

During this practice, an adept should mentally chant: “om aśiḥ hṛṣṭiḥ śrīṇi vama sankoka śartri niḥ śrī jīva śivaḥparamaśivamṛtaṁ varṣaya varṣaya svāhā”.

Afterward, they should inhale through the left nostril and, while doing so, visualize their spiritual self (jīvatman) in the mūlādhāra cakra traveling through susūmna nādi to the sahasrāra cakra, to merge there with the divine consciousness. Then, the adept should exhale through the right nostril.

The adept should subsequently chant a mantra “om aśiḥ hṛṣṭiḥ śrīṇi vama sankoka śartri niḥ śrī jīva śivaḥparamaśivamṛtaṁ varṣaya varṣaya svāhā” and visualize the divine nectar (amṛta), an elixir of immortality, being sprinkled over the ashes. With the blessing of the nectar and the power of mantra “om aśiḥ hṛṣṭiḥ śrīṇi laṁ śaṁbava śartri niḥ upādaya upādaya svāhā”, the ashes are transformed into a new, deified body called Śaṁbhava. Finally, the adept should utter the hamsa mantra to transfer the divine consciousness into their new body.

This elaborate process of purification is also simplified in a form of daily meditations where the mantras are skipped, and the procedures are performed entirely with visualizations. As stated by Timalsina (2012b), the body in Tantric traditions ‘defies the oppositional boundaries of ‘outside’ and ‘inside’, and ‘subject’ and ‘object’’. Hence, healing is a process that goes beyond physicality and recreates spiritual, mantra-based sheaths of the body. One can also say that Samayacāra Śrīvidyā of the Lalitāmbikā temple promotes a ritual paradigm that endorses several forms of embodiments and healing methods. The temple itself is a sacred structure that embodies a tradition of sages and goddesses, with Lalitā as the main deity. The gurus, sages and divinities protect the adepts from outside and from within, when visualized as sacred powers in the bodies of adepts. The deities of Śrīcakra and their energies and powers are internalized during meditative exercises and invoked through mantric incantations. Finally, the body is recreated, divinized, and revitalized through the power of kundalinī.

All these practices are considered means of spiritual transformation and the realization of non-duality. Through internal rituals and yogic exercises, one is supposed to reach a state of union with the divine that grants ultimate protection and heals all ailments. Therefore, Śrīvidyā adepts see the body not only as a physical and spiritual entity, but also as a “system of possibilities” (Timalsina 2015, p. 73) and a vehicle for spiritual journey.

7. The Aims of the Spiritual Journey: Embracing Immanence and Transcendence

In Śrīvidyā, as in the Tantric traditions of Kashmirian Śaivism, the self (aham) refers to the absolute I-consciousness that embraces the totality, and which, as described by Timalsina (2020, p. 767), “immanently encloses all individualities within its embrace”. Conversely, the Samayacāra Śrīvidyā of Lalitāmbikā defines the spiritual practice as a quest for self-discovery and the realization of the transience of worldly powers. Discussing the yoga and bhakti of South India, Shulman (1991, p. 56) gives an example of a poet, Tāyumānavar, who approached a guru named Monakuru and begged him to accept him as a student. Monakuru offered to teach the poet yogic methods of acquisition of esoteric powers and share with him his alchemical wisdom. However, Tāyumānavar declined the offer by saying that none of the supernatural powers are equal to overcoming one’s own mind and attaining inner peace. In his poetic stanzas, Tāyumānavar addresses this inner tranquility and projects it as a deity who embodies knowledge and bliss. A similar attitude can be found among many modern practitioners of Samayacāra, who focus on liberation and achieving peace and spiritual realization, rather than gaining supernatural powers.
In one of the classes conducted during the annual Navaratri Spiritual Workshop in 2012, Swami concluded his lecture by saying:

Some people may think that if you practice Śrīvidyā nothing bad will happen to you. It is not true: good things and bad things may come, but with the grace of the goddess nothing will affect you.

Thus, the Śrīvidyā practice is understood here as a spiritual path of healing and protection: nothing will disturb or hurt an adept who considers themselves as a spiritual being that cannot be afflicted by disease or trauma. This is reflected in yet another story told by the Swami. As the story goes, one of the Swami’s disciples abandoned his spiritual practice and stopped chanting mantras. However, the man eventually returned to Swami, repentant, asking for forgiveness and re-initiation. Swami replied: “I gave the mantra to your Ātman [spiritual self] and this spiritual self will never stop repeating it”. The man was afterward advised to chant the mantra “in unison with his spiritual self”. Thus reassured, he started his spiritual practice anew and, according to his testimony, experienced bliss and peace while chanting the mantra. This example also confirms what Timalsina (2012a, p. 71) observed about Tantric cults in general: these traditions advocate a range of spiritual practices by embracing simultaneous immanence and transcendence (viśottirṇaviśvaṃayata). In other words, one is encouraged to use meditation and other esoteric techniques to realize one’s spiritual self and recognize the divine as both an independent reality and contained within the world of human experience.

Nevertheless, the spiritual practices of the Lalitāmbikā tradition are in many ways connected with concepts of health and healing. In what follows, I wish to describe and interpret the rituals taught at the Lalitāmbikā temple during the Navaratri Spiritual Workshop and indicate how those spiritual routines were integrated into the Samayaśāra system of healing and wellness.

8. Spiritual Healing and Embodied Trust: Reminiscences of the Navaratri Spiritual (Śrīvidyā) Workshop 2012 at the Lalitāmbikā temple

8.1. The Temple: April 2012

It is my first foray into the Anunavi Hills, a long bus ride from Coimbatore town. Around me, the forest and green paddy fields stretch uphill toward the Lalitāmbikā temple. I find Swami waiting for me in the shade of the temple’s colorful gopura (ornate tower). The tower blushes in the setting sun, its layers lined up with brightly-colored, carved goddesses (Figure 3). Nestled on the foothills of picturesque Anuvavi, the temple’s main goddess Lalitā is considered by the local devotees as an embodiment of Mother Nature. The goddess is worshipped with a retinue of other deities that Swami indicates, as we stroll together toward the main temple hall: Gaṇapati, Āstalakṣmī (Eight Manifestations of Goddess of Fortune), Hanumān, Sarasvatī, Navagrahas (Nine Heavenly Bodies), Subrahmanya, Viṣṇu, Durgā, Kāla Bhairava, Sai Baba of Shirdi, Kāmeśvara and Maḥa Lākṣmī.

In the eastern corner of the temple, a couple of ghee-lamps burn for Lākṣmī—Narasimha, the guardian deity of the sacred place. There, the pilgrims entering the temple lean precariously to leave offerings and pay obeisance. Every day, each idol will be draped with garlands to the accompaniment of prayers in Sanskrit and Tamil. Every morning, the deities are bathed, appeased with offerings and sent to sleep at dusk with lullaby-like chants. The structure of the temple complex can also be read in terms of safety and revitalization: the divine beings are guardians of the devotees and manifestations of the spiritual power that underlies all ritual activities.
As I talk with Swami, the gate clinks open, and a group of dhoti-clad disciples approach us. They move warily, whispering about the protective energy of the aisles. I soon notice that the temple activities, and participation in rituals and learning sessions effectively bond the students. One could say that the structure of the spiritual training also contributes to the mental well-being of the participants, by organizing their routines and promoting social interaction. Coming from various parts of India, they arrive with the common purpose of finding their spiritual life. They are spiritual seekers from all walks of life: university students, teachers, and businesspeople. There are men and women from Tamilnadu, Andhra Pradesh, Kerala and North Indian states. Many of them had tried various forms of spiritual practices, some had never meditated before. They came with a belief that their life can be transformed, their longings fulfilled, and spiritual questions finally answered. There are no admission requirements, but the new adepts are asked to strictly follow the guru’s instructions and participate in all daily rituals. The next day, dressed in a white dhoti, I join the adepts in their daily routines.

8.2. Navaratri Mahotsava and the “Spiritual Boot Camp”

In the sanctum sanctorum of the temple, the śrīcakra is installed in its three-dimensional form of Maha Meru (Figure 4) (Baumer 1994, p. 129) at the feet of Goddess Śrī Lalitāmbikā. Here, devotees and adepts are encouraged to perform abhisēka (unction) for the Maha Meru themselves. The abhisēka is believed to bring blessing and prosperity to one’s life, as it attracts the energies of retinues of deities installed in this pyramidal structure. Apart from Śrīvidyā rituals, the temple has other annual and monthly observances. There are two main festivals of the temple—Navarātrī and Caitra Pūrṇimā in April. The Śrī Kāmeśvara Pradosha ritual is performed bimonthly, on the thirteenth day of every fortnight, according to the Hindu calendar (Van Skyhawk 2008, p. 357). During these times, Śiva is worshipped in his form of Kāmeśvara and the rituals, performed with an abhiṣeka of 108 shells, is believed to free the devotees from their sins and remove financial problems. The Navarāṭri festival is celebrated en masse annually in many countries of South Asia. As the name indicates, the festival lasts for nine consecutive nights and ends with the so-called Tenth day of Victory (Vijayadaśami). Navarāṭri celebrations take place worldwide, wherever South Asians settle. Most Navarāṭri festivals are celebrated in the autumn month of Āśvina (September to October). In South India, the main theme of the festival is the victory of the Goddess over demons and consequently the triumph of Good over Evil (Simmons and Sen 2018, p. 1).

In 2012, the Tantric Navarāṭri Mahotsava was also the time of the first Śrīvidyā training camp organized by Swami for a group of new disciples. Tulasī (2018, p. 80), in his study on aesthetics of Hindu rituals, observes that aesthetic experience (anubhava) is the basis and the hinge of existence in the life of a devotee. Sanskrit root bhu means to be or to exist and thus its derivate anubhava can be understood as an existential and epistemological experience. Anubhava is also a key term for understanding the practices of the Lalitāmbikā temple. Each day of the training camp was marked by several events—morning sun meditation, fire oblations, śrīcakra rituals, and meditations. The usual daily routine was as follows:

- 6.00 am: Sun meditation and homa (fire rituals).
- 7.30 am: breakfast.
- 9.00 am: morning meditations and lectures (in English and Tamil) on Śrīvidyā theology.
- 12.00 midday: lunch.
- 2.00 pm: solitary meditations, lectures on Śrīcakra and goddesses of the traditions.
- 4.00 pm: chanting of eulogies; satsang (spiritual discourses).

Evening: śrīcakra rituals.

These practices were supposed to open the adepts to new ways of experiencing the divine. In addition, the Swami conducted lectures on Tantric eulogies (e.g., Lalitāsahasranama stotra) and the significance of śrīcakra. Many sessions ended with participants sharing their spiritual experiences or asking Swami about the meaning of their visions. Soon, one could virtually feel the trepidation and longing of other adepts to have a transcendental experience, or at least a glimpse of the spiritual reality.

At the end of the day, the tensions were temporarily calmed with the Swami’s consoling words and his insistence on emptying one’s mind in meditation. The remark was not meant to douse the flames of the neophytes’ enthusiasm; Swami insisted that meditation should lead to a spontaneous manifestation of the divine within. He told the students that... meditation should just “happen”, and that divine grace is showered on everyone, so there is no need to be anxious. Still, experience of the divine was something that all the devotees secretly wished for.

Each morning, the training began early with a Sun meditation and mantra chanting on the edge of a forest clearing behind the temple. However, even before the sunrise, the temple grounds were humming with life, with morning ablutions, prayers and the preparation of homas (fire offerings). The adepts were asked to meditate in the morning facing east and, in the evening, facing west, to correlate their thoughts with the journey of the Sun. Swami explained the custom by stating that the Sun is god’s image that is visible to everyone, and that every living being receives its blessing. The Sun meditation included a chant of a gāyatrī mantra for the Sun god, called here Bhāskara:

\text{oṁ bhāskarāya vidmahe} \\
\text{mahādyutikarāya dhīmahi} \\
\text{tanno adityah. pracodayāt} \]

On the third day, as usual, the Sun mantra chanting started at 6.00 am, when the meditation ground reddened with pre-dawn light. We were already in a meditative state, sitting cross-legged with eyes half-shut and bodies erect. Suddenly, we all saw a small dog approaching the meditation ground. The mutt slowly turned around, as if monitoring the practitioners, and then sat down on its hind legs. A minute later, it started to growl, visibly imitating the sonorous chanting of mantras. As the chanting continued, the dog also proceeded with the mantric growling, modelling its voice according to the changes in the group recitation. The meditation ended with a minute’s silence, during which the dog also stopped its growling. The incident was later commented on by everyone: the dog and people chanting in unison was accepted as an undeniable proof of the mantras’ divine potency. The Swami, discussing the “dog’s chant”, as it was later referred to, added that Tripurā is herself Mātrikadevi: she embodies all sounds and words. Hence, the goddess was also praised as Parā Vāc, the Supreme Speech (Reich 2020). Interestingly, the Sanskrit word Mātra means both a sound or phoneme and mother. In this respect, it is worth relating another incident that happened during the training camp. After one of the afternoon meditations, two adepts quarreled about the correct pronunciation of a particular mantra. The one accused of mispronouncing the formula angrily argued back: “The Goddess is my mother! A mother wouldn’t get angry with her child for misarticulating a word.” Indeed, many adepts I met in the temple considered devotion to and intimate connection with the divine as more important than the perfect articulation of mantras. They also believed that the child-like attitude toward the goddess entails surrender to the divine will and thus eliminates anxiety, insecurity and stress-related conditions.

Moreover, all the statements of the guru (not just their mantras) were believed to have divine potency. Indeed, Swami declared that meditation in the presence of a guru, or even listening to their voice carefully, takes an adept to higher spiritual levels and brings mental peace, harmony and balance into their life. It was a reassuring message for those practitioners who were afraid that the inner energy kundalinī, awakened through meditation, might negatively impact their life and health. Such concerns were voiced by several new students. Similarly, some were afraid of the potency of Śrīcakra. In fact, in many Tantric temples and family traditions of Kerala and Tamilnadu, I have noticed Śrīcakras being honored with flower offerings but not worshipped in a sequence prescribed in ritual handbooks. This can be explained in two ways. First, Śrīcakra rites require the initiation of the Śrīvidyā mantra from a qualified guru. Second, and more importantly, there is a widespread opinion among the devotees that even a minor mistake in a Śrīcakra ritual may cause serious spiritual problems. The latter taboo is invariably related to the belief that Śrīcakra is an energy tool inhabited by divine potencies, and therefore needs to be treated with reverence and according to the rules put forward by the lineages of masters.

The process of internalizing the Śrīcakra practice can be understood as the domestication of the divine energies. The presence of the spiritual guides in human and spiritual forms implies security and supervision. According to the tenets of the tradition, the guru, goddess, her mantra and yantra are ultimately the same. Thus, the presence of the guru is considered divine, and is likewise an embodiment of the goddess’s powers. Additionally, the predominant image of the goddess of this tradition is one of a Universal Mother guiding and protecting the adepts in the same manner as the guru. In this respect, it is worth noting that adepts undergoing training at the Lalitâmbikâ temple were asked to repeat the following affirmation daily: “The goddess Śrī Lalitâmbikâ exists inside me, hence no disease can attack me. My body is lying on the lap of the Mother Goddess, there is no pain and no symptoms of any illness”. Thus, the above-mentioned practices can be interpreted in relation to the concept of “embodied trust”, that is, trusting God’s will with ones’ physical body (Kiil and Salamonsen 2013, p. 487). This, in turn, points to the traditional definition of the Sanskrit term “Tantra”, which relates it to the noun “tamu”, meaning body. Thus, according to Tantric tradition, a person needs to activate and use the potencies of their own body to achieve their spiritual goals. The followers of Lalitâmbikâ Śrîvidyâ were also convinced that, through the proper use of one’s body (in mediation and yoga), it is possible to find health, security and freedom. As explained by the Swami, health comes first as a prerequisite for further spiritual development. Health, in this tradition, is cared about in multiple ways: the programs are aimed at the betterment of physical, mental and spiritual conditions. While the meditative sessions and śrîcakra rites connected adepts with the tradition and were a means of pacifying their tensions, the fire offerings were performed early in the morning to energize the adepts and to connect them with the elemental forces. Interestingly, the busy schedule of rites and meditations included a weekly voluntary consultation with an Ayurvedic doctor. Therefore, the adepts were not only offered spiritual tools for self-development and healing, but they were also diagnosed in several ways. The Ayurvedic doctor monitored the physical condition of the adepts and the Swami insisted on preparing and checking everyone’s astrological charts. Anyone found to have any astrological problems was instructed to perform rites of purification or to meditate on the Navagrahas (Nine Heavenly Bodies). According to Swami’s understanding, even if one strives for a balanced life, Râhu, the north lunar node, along with Ketu, a non-material celestial entity responsible for eclipses, disturbs human life. The Śrîvidyâ meditation was said to nullify the astrological influences of Râhu-Ketu and re-establish one on a path toward balanced life. The adepts I interviewed after the camp acknowledged that the spiritual exercises they learned allowed them to alleviate pain and to some extent heal their bodies. Gautam, a Tantric practitioner who has studied under Swami since 2013, explains that the Śrîvidyâ meditation helped him not only with his spiritual quests, but also with physical problems:

The [Śrîvidyâ] practice helps us achieve material enjoyment (bhoga) and liberation (mokṣa). This is an all-inclusive sâdhana [spiritual practice], it’s not life denying. In my case, I have seen a tremendous change in my inner chemistry and perception, learnt to heal myself as well as others. I have healed many ailments like pneumonia, ovarian cysts and depression, problems related to mind and body. It works extremely fast.

Thus, it could be said that the Lalitâmbikâ Śrîvidyâ center tailored the Tantric practices, creating a system of health-oriented practices and diagnosis. The adepts not only meditated on internal energy but were encouraged to visualize it being shared with those who need help.

8.3. Body, Cakras and Spiritual Embodiment

According to Ulland (2012, p. 101), the term “embodied spirituality” refers to spiritual practices and traditions in which the body is a fundamental tool for spiritual development. This is true for Samayâcâra Śrîvidyâ, where the body plays a significant role: bodily energy centers are identified with deities and yantras and divinized with mantras. In fact, the correlation of mantras, deities, yantras and the aspirant’s body is essential in all Tantric traditions (Timalsina 2012a). In the tradition of Lalitāmbikā, the body is considered the abode of the goddess and the goddess herself.

The adepts of the Navaratri camp learned that the Lalitāmbikā tradition accepts the six cakras known from the majority of yoga sources, but the top one, the sahasrāra cakra, is divided into three layers called “seats” (piṭha): guru-piṭha, gāyatrī piṭha and śrīvidyā-piṭha. The sahasrāra is unique by being an energetic plane located beyond the physical body (Śivasamhitā 2007, verse 5.191–2). The plane is where people can connect with the tradition and the divine. While the whole tradition of gurus is meditated upon in guru-piṭha, an adept reconnects with the goddess through gāyatrī mantra practice, while concentrating on gāyatrī piṭha, and achieves enlightenment by uniting with the goddess in śrīvidyā-piṭha (Figure 1). The three piṭhas also symbolize the spiritual identity of guru, goddess and mantras (Varivasāyārasaṣya 2.101).

In the Lalitāmbikā tradition, the system of bodily cakras also correlates with dhātus (basic tissue elements). According to Āyurveda, the body is supposed to have seven dhātus, each derived from the one preceding it in the following sequence: rasa (chyle or extract of nutriment), blood, flesh, fat, bone, marrow, and ova or semen (Fields 1961, p. 43). As explained by Swami:

All the elements relate to the cakras from mūlādhāra to ājñā. When we chant the mūla mantra (main formula) related to the cakras and do the tapas (asceticism), the five elements get strengthened and the immunity level increases. The body, which is composed of five elements, is ruled by seven dhātus that are again linked with the cakras, and the seminal fluids are the divine secrets that should be transformed into the elixir of immortality in the sahasrāra cakra.

Thus, the Śrīvidyā practices are integrated with a system of natural medicine of the Āyurveda and Siddha provenance. In fact, the temple cooperates with Āyurvedic doctors to develop treatments for elderly people. The teaching of the Lalitāmbikā tradition agrees with Siddha medicine that the physical structures of the universe (macrocosm) and humans (microcosm) are built from Five Elements: Nīlām (Earth), Nīr (Water), Tī (Fire), Kātru (Air) and Vin (Sky). These names denote the properties of the elements that are present in different proportions in all living beings and non-living entities. It is believed that various tissues and organs of the body are a combination of these elements (Thas 2008, p. 26).

The Lalitāmbikā adepts were told that in additional meditations, usually performed once a week, the cakras should also be imagined as being guarded by their patron deities and connected with bodily tissues or organs. The basic scheme of those meditations can be presented in the following manner:

Ājñā—mind—cartilage—Hākint
Viśuddha—space-skin—Dākint
Anāhata—air—blood—Rākinti
Maniṭāra—fire-muscles—Lākint
Śvādiśṭhāna—water-fat—Kākint
Mūlādhāra—earth-bones—Śākint

During these meditations, adepts were instructed to move their awareness into their organs, bones and tissues, and feel the inner energy flowing inside them eradicating disease. However, even though Swami restructured the teaching methods and substituted complex rituals with meditative exercises, the practice is still rooted in the textual tradition of Śrīvidyā. For instance, the association of patron goddesses with dhātu is a dogma also found in Purāṇātarā Kalpasūtra sutra (7.28) in a section called dhātunāthaḥgajam—and the veneration of the dhātus. The deities associated with cakras in this meditation are also invoked in the same context in other Tantric texts like Rudrāyāmala Tantra (White 2003, pp. 221–29).

On the final day of the training camp, every adept was formally initiated into the tradition and tested on their ability to perform a fully-fledged Śricakra ritual. Their meditations and rituals were observed by the Swami, who later individually instructed the adepts on further practice, which included meditation and rituals, but also health-oriented visualizations and protective chants.

8.4. The Goddess: Poison and the Remedy

As this paper has tried to indicate in the previous sections, the spiritual practices of Samayācāra are focused on protection and healing. This is directly stated in a temple leaflet given to the adept attending the Navaratri workshop, which introduced the temple as a “Srividya wellness centre”, and further stated:

Śrividya promotes a holistic approach to life—it is an inner journey to realize the light of Brahmajñāna and refrain from causing harm to other beings”. “Goddess Ambikā [Mother] is the disease for all those who don’t realize that everything is Brahman, and she is also the medicine that cures the disease [i.e., ignorance].

The final statement echoes age-old beliefs of many Indian societies, which considered plagues or smallpox epidemics as a coming of the goddess (Stewart 1995). In Kerala and Tamilnadu, smallpox was believed to be an expression of divine power and the goddess herself. While many shrines of the Goddess of Smallpox and Chickenpox can be found in villages across India, in South India, contracting the disease was considered to be a blessing of the Goddess Vastūrī (Nair 2019, pp. 361–63). The statement about the Goddess being both poison and cure attained a new meaning in 2020, when the pandemic started: the Tantric practitioners attempted to overcome the fear of the unknown disease by interpreting the pandemic situation as one of the multiple faces of the Goddess, who is the only reality. Furthermore, on 5 February 2020, the temple organized online mass chanting of the mahāmrtyunjaya mantra to provide relief for all people affected by COVID-19. The chanting, with volunteers joining online from around the world, lasted for a month and was concluded with prayers and blessings of the Swami. The event also marked a new stage of temple life, as it began to provide its services online; since the beginning of the pandemic, the temple has organized e-workshops and provided online streaming of rituals and other spiritual events.

9. Conclusions

According to the teachings of the Lalitāmbikā temple, the recognition of the non-duality of the universe is therefore a prerequisite for anyone who wants to be healed. In the words of the Swami, the healing provided at the temple is a spark that initiates a spiritual change in human life: it neutralizes people’s karmic blocks and negative thought patterns, cleanses cakras, and sets them on their journey toward liberation. Samayācāra Śrividya of the Lalitāmbikā temple is also an eclectic school of spiritual practice that does not shy away from incorporating elements of astrology and Ayurveda.

The present study has also tried to show how various forms of embodiment and healing define the practice of Samayācāra Śrividya of the Lalitāmbikā temple. Defining embodied spirituality, Trousdale (2013, pp. 23–24) indicates that many Asian, religious traditions consider the human body as a tool for generating spiritual powers and a vehicle for liberation. Samayācāra Śrividya subscribes to this philosophy and prescribes various techniques that allow an adept to divinize their body. The temple itself is an embodiment of the tradition that goes back to the ancient sages. The guru of the Samayācāra Śrividya represents and embodies the lineage of teachers who have taught the sacred doctrine to the deserving students. Adepts who follow the tradition are on a quest to understand the spiritual reality and to experience the non-dual state. To attain this state, they identify themselves with the goddess and her representations (śrīcakra and mantra); they become an abode of the divine. Hence, Samayācāra Śrividya practices lead to an experience of simultaneous immanence and transcendence of the divine.

As this paper has tried to indicate, the Samayācāra practices taught in the Lalitāmbikā temple are health-oriented programs and the temple integrates spirituality with various forms of healing activities and social work. In recent years, the temple established a non-governmental organization (NGO) called the Śrī Lalitāmbikā Trust, which supports the underprivileged citizens of nearby villages by way of providing food and educational and medical aids. The trust also introduced a “Can Cure” project that supports cancer patients and oncological departments. Moreover, it sponsors medical camps and cooperates with local hospitals, providing yoga and meditation sessions.

Seligman (2010) observed that mystical traditions offer “healing practices that simultaneously address the cognitive-discursive and embodied aspects of self”. These systems contain an integrative religious ideology and initiatory rites that aim to heal the disrupted selves. They attempt to help a traumatized individual through both “embodied and discursive practices that reinforce one another in the process”. Similarly, in the Samayācāra Lalitāmbikā tradition, Tantric rites, initiations and meditations are employed to help adepts in their quest for wholeness and to eradicate physical and mental pains rooted in the belief of duality. In other words, Samayācāra of the Lalitāmbikā temple is a Śrīvidyā cult that defines itself as a healing tradition with a holistic approach to life.

Notes
1 See also (Nichter and Nichter 1996) on the language of illness in medical anthropology and construction of an illness taxonomy in South Asia.
2 I use the term “healing practices” to refer to a variety of meditations, rites, and visualizations. Many Tantric practitioners use the term kriyā (an act) to refer to these spiritual remedies and the name connotes the necessity of such practices and their instantaneous effects. See Sax (2010, p. 4) for similar observations on kārya and devakārya, in the context of ritualism and ritual efficiency.
3 The goddess of the tradition is invoked with many names, but as the temple name indicates, she is praised as Lalitā (the Playful One) and Ambikā (Mother). The epithet “Lalitā” indicates her nature—the dynamics of life and the world that appears to be in a constant flux are believed to be the effects of her divine play. However, she is also a protective mother for those who follow her tradition.
4 A few years after our first meeting, Swami obtained Vedānta Saṃnyāsa Dīkṣā from Arsha Vidya Gurukula, an initiation into the ascetic order of Vedānta, and received a new name—Swami Jagadatmananda Saraswati.
5 This paper is based on data from my field research in Tamilnadu and Kerala. The interviews with the Swami and other Tantric practitioners were conducted during my multiple visits to the Lalitāmbikā temple in the years 2012–2019.
6 On history, legends, and pilgrimages to the Ayyapan temple, see also (Daniel 1984).
7 Slouber (2017, p. 107) indicates that Tripurasundari literature abounds in references to healing and incorporates the cult of the Gāruda goddesses, known for their ability to heal poison and drive away snakes.
8 Fisher (2012, p. 76) observes that while in Vedānta, upāsana refers to a meditative practice aimed at the realization of Brahmajñāna, in Vedantaized Śrīvidyā, upāsanā is more than meditation or visualization—the term referring to the entire Śrīvidyā ritualism.
9 In the final stage of meditation, the advanced practitioners of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā mentally reach the Tenth Centre, a secret cakra known also as vajra cakra, where they experience the “ultimate bliss of non-duality”. Interestingly, the location of vajra cakra is the same as ājñā cakra but it is accessible only after all other cakras are fully activated.
10 The correspondence between the cakras of the yogic body and the āvāraṇa are also discussed in the authoritative texts of Śrīvidyā for instance Yoginīhrdaya (2.8) (Padoux and Roger-Orphe 2013). However, the Samayācāra tradition of the Lalitāmbikā temple simplifies the meditative practices that focus on identifying adepts’ bodies with the enclosures of Śrīcakra.
11 In other Śrīvidyā sects, there are different sets of bodily cakras that are to be visualized and contemplated. For instance, Urban (1997, pp. 20–21) mentions “nine energy centers or cakras which run along the spine from the genitals to the top of the head (the mūlādhāra [groin], the svādhīśṭhāna [genitals], the maniṣṭhāra [navel], the anāhata [stomach], the viśuddhī [neck], the lambikā [mouth], the ājñā [eye brows], the sahasrāra [the crown] and the kulasahasraa”.

Similarly, in his study on secret societies and Tantra, Urban (1997, p. 17) observes that “after an initiation the adept’s own exoteric observances at Lalitāmbikā temple include also muttagukal, a ritual of coconut breaking that is performed to remove spiritual obstacles. Devotees may also request Śri Guru Bhagavān Prārthana—prayers and rituals for Daksināmūrti. There is also a special ritual called Śrī Viṣṇu Durghā Prārthana, a lamp offering performed for women suffering from physical or mental problems. The priests of Lalitāmbikā temple perform also special rituals (naimittika) on auspicious occasions. Hence, for instance, Śri Kāmeśvara Pradoṣa Prārthanā, an abhiṣeka for Śiva, is performed during the pradoṣa time to remove sins and lead one towards liberation.

Interestingly, while many Śrīvidyā practitioners in South India invoke the guruparamparā with the following prayers: on śrī hariṁ śrīṁ hasakapphraṇaḥ hasarakaśamalavaraṇaḥ śahakapphraṇaḥ sahaśaṃalavaraṇayaḥ (Hanneder 2017, p. 233), in the Lalītāmbikā temple, the usual practice is to repeat trice the following prayer: Aimkāra-hṛimkāra-rahasya-yukta Śrīnkāra-gūḍhārtha-mahāvibhiṣyata, Oṃkāra-marma-pratipādinibhyām Namo namah śrīgurupādukābhyāh | Salutations to the pāduka (sandals) of guru, which contain the secret of aim and hṛim and the glory of śrīṁ and which expound the mystery of Om. | Even though both prayers indicate the importance of Śrīvidyā tritari (aim-hṛim-śrīṁ), a formula that opens many mantras of the tradition, the prayer of Lalītāmbikā ascribes the three syllables to the qualities of a guru.

Most of these mantras are various forms of gāyatrī mantras (Hatcher 2019). This, in turn, echoes the Bhāskarārya notion that the main Śrīvidyā mantra is a Tantric version of Vedic gāyatrī. This ultimate unity of Vedic and Tantric gāyatrī is supposed to be one of the secrets revealed through the practice of Samayācāra Śrīvidyā.

Paraśurāma Kalpasūtra refers to the highest cakra by various names, such as: brahmābila or devāśānta: “The first two mentioned sometimes refer to the fontanel as a separate body place (maybe not a cakra in the proper sense), and sometimes they are identified with the Thousand-petaled Lotus” (Wilke 2011, p. 146).

Samuel (2012, p. 278) observes that there are multiple applications of prāṇāyāma and, in the process of controlling the internal flows of prāṇa, an adept might also be able to direct or channel their emotions.

Many lectures conducted at the Lalītāmbikā temple were devoted to the esoteric correspondences between the stotra and mantras of Śrīvidyā. The various names of the goddess were, according to the Swami’s interpretation, either allusions to, or codified versions of, the main mantras.

Similarly, the Jānānārāṇa-tantra elaborates on the powers of the same three syllables, stating that one who chants them will charm the Three Worlds (2.10–13).

The practice is also alluded to at the very start of Śrīcakra-nyāsa, a short treatise preserved in the form of a palm-leaf manuscript in the Trippunithura Manuscript Library, Kerala. There, an adept is instructed to visualize their body in the form of a central dot or, in the proper sense), and sometimes they are identified with the Thouand-petaled Lotus” (Wilke 2011, p. 146).

Similarly, in his study on secret societies and Tantra, Urban (1997, p. 17) observes that “after an initiation the adept’s own exoteric self is destroyed and put to death; symbolically, his ordinary physical body is dissolved, while at the same time, the ordinary boundaries of the ‘social body’ are also transgressed”.

Apart from above-mentioned rituals and daily prayers, the temple routines include also various homas (fire oblations) that can be requested by the devotees. Thus, Mahā-ganapati homa is performed to clear the obstacles before other rituals and Sudarśana homa is performed to protect one from enemies and evil influences. In the temple one may also find idols of Ten Great Goddesses (Daśamahāvidyā) installed near the main altar and worshipped along with the main deity—Lalītāmbikā. The idols are daily cleaned, anointed, and pleased with garlands of flowers, and lighting of oil lamps (nirajāṇa). The Daśamahāvidyā are believed to be the representations of the main goddess and their various attributes are also visualized during additional meditations.

In Śrī Tripurārahasya Māhātmākhaṇḍam (2011) readers can find exact locations of those powers on the meru, as per the Śrīvidyā tradition.

Additionally, Wilke (2012, p. 40) notes that in the Paraśurāma Kalpasūtra tradition the Vedic customs related to the worship of the sun with offerings and chanting of the gāyatrī mantra are combined with Tantric rites that include meditating on one’s guru and the goddess in the brahmārundhāra cakra and visualizing a nectar of immortality (āmṛta) flowing down from that cakra and purifying the whole body.

A similar statement can be found in Vāmākeśvarinātā 1.11.

An interesting analogy can be found in Ramaswamy (1997) discussion on the feminization of Tamil language. Ramaswamy (1997, p. 121) observes that “devotees may empower their language by drawing upon three different models of femininity an all-powerful goddess, a compassionate but endangered mother, and a desirable but unattainable maiden”.

There is an interesting analogy in the healing traditions of European Middle Ages: “According to Ptolemy’s Tetrabiblos, humans were directly influenced by planetary energies: the second century C.E. astronomer solidified the doctrine of the correspondences between microcosm and macrocosm, whereby each astral body had its analogical equivalent on earth—a fundamental tenet of the notion of magic. Healing, therefore, was also ruled by planetary energies that could be deployed through the use of sympathetic magic” (Leopardi 2014, p. 483).

28 Additionally, Saraf (1970, p. 966) indicates that “the Hindu complex of worship that involves an interplay of the three elements and regards all the three as one—the devatā who is the object of worship, the mantra which the devotee pursues in his sādhanā, and the guru”.

29 On the other hand, Trawick (1992, p. 148) observes that in South India, practitioners of Siddha medicine “have sought and found their roots in the only other major indigenous science of the body besides Ayurveda: Tantric yoga”.
