Abstract
This study discusses the International Committee for the Red Cross (ICRC) role in protecting and assisting victims of the Libyan revolution in 2011. The purpose of this study is to explore more about the role of the International Committee for the Red Cross (ICRC) in protecting and assisting victims of war as one step on a humanitarian mission. The author used the non-government organizations (NGOs) and humanitarian action concepts. The author’s research method to analyze this study was a descriptive method through a literature review. Based on research done, the author found that the revolution in Libya in 2011 was one of the effects of the Arab Spring in the Middle East region. The author also found that the ICRC carried out its humanitarian missions by providing food, water, medical supplies, medical equipment, and clothing.

INTRODUCTION
Conflict in international relations has increased along with the movement of democracy and freedom waves, leading to protests to bring down authoritarianism and injustice in several Middle East regions, called the Arab Spring (Sahide, 2015, hal. 118). The Arab Spring was started in Tunisia in December 2010 when a young man named Bouazizi did self-immolation as a protest that succeeded in overthrowing Zainal Abidin Ben Ali (Ghafur, 2014, hal. 86). The protests then spread to the Middle East, and one that took place in Tahrir Square, Egypt, on January 25, 2011, also succeeded in overthrowing Husni Mubarak (Ghafur, 2014, hal. 86).

The protests in Tunisia and Egypt resulted in a change in Libya’s political climate, leading to a resistance movement in Benghazi to overthrow Muammar Gaddafi in February 2011 (Nainggolan, 2019, hal. 7). The supports to overthrow Muammar Gaddafi’s 40-year regime was getting more powerful when the Security Council of the United Nations (UN) and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) joined under Humanitarian Intervention to protect Libyan civilians’ safety following UN Security Council Resolution 1973 (Nur, 2015) (Sahide, 2015, hal. 118). Muammar Gaddafi was killed in an attack launched by an insurgent group in Sirte on October 20, 2011 (Gunawan, 2014).

The Arab Spring, as the beginning of the awakening of new hopes for a better and democratic life, especially in the Middle East, gave birth to a more tense and frightening atmosphere because overthrowing an authoritarian regime involved rather violent... elements. Even after eight years after Muammar Gaddafi’s government was successfully overthrown, Libya still experiences armed conflicts between militia groups, the military, and pro-regime groups from the past (Nainggolan, 2019, hal. 7). This prolonged armed conflict in Libya has killed thousands of people. According to the Libyan Health Minister under the leadership of the National Transitional Council (NTC), Naji Barakat stated that during the six months of overthrowing Muammar Gaddafi, around 30,000 people were killed and 50,000 people were injured (Nugraha, 2011). According to the World Health Organization (WHO), from April to July 6, 2019, the death toll from Libya’s conflict reached 1,000 (Perdana, 2019). Until now, the Security Council of the United Nations (UN) is still trying to urge the parties to the conflict to agree to a ceasefire, considering that tens of thousands of victims from the ferocious armed upheaval in Libya.

The Arab Spring is hoped to be the solution to a better and democratic life. However, the steps taken through acts of resistance and rebellion have had lasting consequences. Armed conflict on upholding democracy causes many losses, including women and children who should be protected from the attacks.

Children are the easiest target for opposition groups and the old pro-regime groups to become soldiers (Child Soldier) (I Gede Adhi Supradnyana, 2020). No child dreams and aspires to spend his childhood guerrillas in the forest, carry firearms and hunt targets using a shouldered weapon. However, around 300,000 children were trapped in this situation (Sinaga, 2010). Director of the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) for the Middle East and North Africa, Geert Cappelaere, stated that around 500,000 children had been recruited into child soldiers in Libya (Perdana, 2018).

Parents and mothers are also easy targets. The threat to the lives and safety of civilians causes a high wave of refugees. The armed conflict in Libya led to a wave of refugees from Libya heading to neighboring countries, such as Tunisia and Egypt, where 100,000 people entered Tunisia to avoid conflict in their country (ICRC, Sejarah, 2019).

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC), as an international non-governmental organization, strives to protect and assist victims of conflict and armed upheaval. The civil war in Libya that lasted for nine years (2011 to 2020) due to the Arab Spring wave has killed hundreds of thousands of people and threatens their safety, especially children and women protected under the 1949 Geneva Convention. Besides, the continuing conflict has resulted in an increased number of refugees from Libya.

The ICRC provides protection and humanitarian assistance directly on the battlefield through a series of actions in the health sector and meeting primary needs for the victims (ICRC, History, 2019). Their role is an exciting issue to research. Even though Libya’s conflict was a step towards a democratic process, the civilians’ safety also needed to be considered to continue their lives again.

RESEARCH METHOD

The author used qualitative research methods that focused on literature review and read works related to the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) to ensure protection and assistance for conflict and armed upheaval victims in Libya. The author chose Libya due to its 9-year conflict, which had killed thousands of lives and caused a high wave of refugees in several neighboring countries, such as Tunisia and Egypt.

Other sources in this paper were articles, news, journals that provided supporting data to understand the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) in ensuring protection and assistance for victims of conflict and armed upheaval in Libya. The author conducted a literature review first regarding the chronology of the emergence of conflict turmoil and its development in Libya.

Theoretical Framework

The author used two concepts to analyze the issue, called the Non-Government Organization (NGO) and Humanitarian Action.

Non-Government Organization (NGO) Concept

Non-governmental organizations (NGOs) are one of the actors in international relations since the 19th century. According to Margaret P. Karns, a non-governmental organization (NGO) is defined as a group of individuals or voluntary organizations, usually not affiliated with any government to provide services or advocate for public policy. Meanwhile, according to Tujil, NGOs can be defined as independent, non-partisan, non-profit organizations aiming to improve the marginalized quality (Tujil, 1999).
According to David Lewis in a book entitled The Management of Non-Governmental Development Organization, one way to analyze NGOs’ role is from an organizational perspective. Three points can explain NGOs’ fundamental role. David Lewis distinguishes NGOs’ roles into three types: implementers, catalysts, and partners (Lewis, 2007).

This research used the NGO paradigm proposed by Mansour Fakih about the NGO paradigm typology. This typology classifies NGOs according to paradigm, action and structure. This typology describes the NGO movement in three types: the paradigm of conformism, reform and transformation (Fakih, NGOs in Indonesia, 1991).

Fakih mapped the political positions of NGO activists into three types. First, the conformist consists of NGO activists who carry out their work based on the charitable aid paradigm, or what is often called “working without theory,” or are project-oriented and work as charitable aid organizations. This type adapts itself to the existing system and structure. Their programs and activities’ primary motivations to help the people in need (Fakih, 1991).

The second category is reformers. This type of NGO is based on the ideology of modernization and developmentalism. Public participation in development needs to increase by placing corruption issues in the government as the leading cause of society’s backwardness (Fakih, 1991). They pay more attention to aspects of the approach and methodology in their movements and support developmentalism. This view’s main objective is to change the top-down and non-participatory approach to an approach that emphasizes participation and community self-help (Ningrum, 2010).

Third, the transformation perspective consists of NGO groups that re-examine basic assumptions and ideological problems to find an alternative to the other two approaches. One of these perspectives is to question the mainstream paradigm and ideology hidden in it and to try to find alternative paradigms that will change the structures and supra structures that oppress the people and the possibility of unlocking their human potential (Fakih, 1991). This paradigm makes it possible for the people to control the production of information and their ideology. This approach is usually found among NGOs working on environmental issues and clearly shows the spirit of counter-capitalist hegemony through its newspapers and magazines. It is translated through their campaign and advocacy programs to defend and support poor farmers, indigenous people, and marginalized groups (Fakih, 2004).

Humanitarian Action Concept

Humanitarian action is carried out by individuals or groups where aspects of humanity are being threatened, such as natural disasters, conflicts, or wars. This humanitarian action aims to save human life. Humanitarian action is based on four basic principles, such as (Karmila, 2018)

a. Humanity

   Humanitarian action is purely to help and protect people from their suffering.

b. Impartial

   Humanitarian action is carried out without any discrimination in any form or on any basis.

c. Independence

   Humanitarian action stands alone or is separate from autonomy and military, political and economic interests.

d. Neutrality

   Humanitarian action is neutral or does not take sides with any party.

   Humanitarian action helps and protects civilians, wounded soldiers, children victims of war by providing food, proper water sanitation, temporary shelter, health services and education. ‘Humanitarian Aids’ is distributed by the state, individuals, groups, domestic/international companies, Non-Government Organizations (NGOs), or International Government Organizations (IGO). Meanwhile, workers from domestic/international organizations and humanitarian goals are called ‘Humanitarian Workers/Aid Workers/Humanitarian Aid Workers’.

   Humanitarian workers are much protected and respected. Humanitarian workers work in non-armed conflict situations. Then, they are covered by International Human Rights Law and domestic legislation. However, if the humanitarian worker works in an armed conflict situation, they will be protected by international humanitarian law (Karmila, 2018).
DISCUSSION

Dynamics of Conflict in Libya

Sociologically, conflict is defined as a social process between two or more people or groups in which one party tries to get rid of the other by destroying or rendering the opponent powerless (Sofiyati, 2011, hal. 2). Meanwhile, according to Winardi, conflict is the opposition or a disagreement between people, groups and organizations (Winardi, 1994, hal. 1).

There are two different views on seeing conflict. The traditional view considers that conflict is a harmful action and must be avoided. According to the modern view, conflict is a good action and must continue to be developed because it can stimulate problem-solving (Sotopo, 2012, hal. 267). The dynamics of Libya’s conflict have been rolling for approximately nine years (2011 to 2020). The conflict was the result of the Arab Spring. The author will analyze the dynamics of the conflict in Libya using the conflict stages based on periods. The following is a picture of the stages of conflict escalation.

Source: (Brahm, 2003)

Based on the figure above, the author analyzes the chronology of Libya’s conflicts for nine years (2011 to 2020).
1) Pre-conflict

Pre-conflict is a condition when a mismatch of goals between two or more parties happen. Libya was once led by an authoritarian leader named Muammar Gaddafi. His regime lasted for 40 years. Muammar Gaddafi started his regime after his coup d’état against King Idris on September 1, 1969. In April 1973, Muammar Gaddafi carried out a cultural revolution by issuing a ban on communism, conservativism, capitalism, atheists, and other Muslim groups (Syahputra, 2017). This act violated fundamental human rights, which was the freedom to determine someone’s beliefs and activities. Gaddafi also eliminated political parties and considered people involved in political parties as a traitor.

Muammar Gaddafi nationalized all businesses and determined that all economic activities were under state control. In 2006, there was a demonstration against hanging a human rights activist in Libya (Akbar, 2015). However, Libya’s turmoil again subsided because the authoritarian policies imposed by Muammar Gaddafi were seen as commonplace. Until finally, the Libyan people realized the Arab Spring in 2010, which became a new hope for the Middle East people to get a more democratic life.

The Arab Spring started in Tunisia in December 2010 when a young man named Bouazizi did self-immolation as a protest that succeeded in overthrowing Zainal Abidin Ben Ali (Ghafur, 2014, hal.86). The widespread protests in the Middle East also succeeded in overthrowing Husni Mubarok in Egypt (Ghafur, 2014, p. 86).

Muammar Gaddafi realized that the Arab Spring phenomenon could spread to Libya. Therefore, Gaddafi issued a policy to block social networks, which triggered heated relations between legitimate government groups and opposition groups who wanted to overthrow him (Syahputra, 2017).

2) Confrontation

Confrontation happens when conflict grows wider. In the dynamics of the Libyan conflict, it began with an anti-government demonstration on February 15, 2011. This demonstration was held by approximately 600 people in front of the Benghazi police headquarters (Agustinova, 2013). However, Libya’s turmoil again subsided because the authoritarian policies imposed by Muammar Gaddafi were seen as commonplace. Until finally, the Libyan people realized the Arab Spring in 2010, which became a new parts of Libya, such as Tajoura, Zintan, Ajdabiyah, Al Bayda, Tripoli, and Misrata (Syahputra, 2017).

The demonstration ended chaotically after Gaddafi’s party sent mercenaries who opened fire on the demonstrators using helicopters. The victims reached 300 people from opposition groups and 120 people from the pro-Gaddafi forces (Agustinova, 2013). At this stage, various kinds of attacks and violence were committed by both parties to the conflict. Since February 21, 2011, Gaddafi’s troops increasingly deployed their warplanes to bombard demonstrators in Tripoli (Agustinova, 2013).

The confrontation stage was also marked by both parties’ activities, which gathered support and assistance from outside parties. Muammar Gaddafi’s party garnered support from his loyal followers, including Libyan Prime Minister Baghdadi al-Mahmudi. He also brought mercenaries from Niger and Chad to bombard alleged traitors (Akbar, 2015).

3) Crisis

A crisis is often referred to as the peak of the conflict. At this stage, the relationship between the two warring parties is in tension. Muammar Gaddafi’s forces controlled Tripoli, while anti-government opposition groups controlled western Libya, such as Benghazi, Misrata, and Ajdabiya (Agustinova, 2013). Muammar Gaddafi’s actions were increasingly brutal and uncontrollable. Until finally, at the end of February 2011, the opposition group formed the National Transitional Council of Libya (NTC) as a rival government to overthrow Gaddafi’s regime (Agustinova, 2013).

On March 8, 2011, Muammar Gaddafi’s troops attacked Zawiya in response to a statement made by the opposition leader, Mustafa Abdul Jalil (Syahputra, 2017). The opposition leader stated that they would not pursue Gaddafi if he were willing to step down from his chair within 72 hours from March 7, 2011. The attack carried out by Gaddafi’s group made western Libya fall into the hands of pro-Gaddafi and further cornered the position of the opposition group.

The brutal actions carried out by Gaddafi’s loyalist group drew a response from the international community. On March 17, 2011, the United Nations, as an international organization, passed a resolution to implement a “no-fly zone” to Libya, prohibiting the shipment of weapons to and from Libya, and issued an order to freeze the assets of the Gaddafi family abroad (Agustinova, 2013). Most North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) members began to prepare sea and air troops to Libya as a follow-up to the United Nations’ resolution. The actions taken by NATO member countries were based on humanitarian intervention actions to protect Libyan civilians’ lives.

On March 19, 2011, France sent dozens of troops and warplanes to Libya to destroy heavy vehicles and air defense bases belonging to Gaddafi’s loyalist forces. The French action was followed by Britain, the United States, ten member countries of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), and some Arab countries. Apart from sending troops and warplanes, these countries also sent weapons, money and military training for opposition forces (Syahputra, 2017).

The fighting between the opposition group and Gaddafi’s loyalist group was heating up until it peaked on August 20, 2011, in Tripoli. The Libyan capital was inundated by Gaddafi’s loyalists firing on from the top of the buildings’ water towers and roofs. Opposition groups managed to seize Tripoli from Gaddafi’s loyalist group at the end of August 2011. The war spread to Sirte, Gaddafi’s birthplace, suspected as Gaddafi’s hiding place (Akbar, 2015).

4) Consequences

A consequence affects the conflicting parties, the wider community, and the environment. The war spread to Sirte, which managed to fall into the opposition’s hands. On the same date, Muammar Gaddafi had fled out of Sirte with his bodyguards by car. Gaddafi’s action was responded to by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) air force which then fired on Gaddafi’s motorcade. Muammar Gaddafi managed to survive the attack launched by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), then he hid under a sewer (Agustinova, 2013).

Opposition groups found out where Muammar Gaddafi was hiding, and they dragged him out of the sewer. Muammar Gaddafi was then surrounded and shot in the head, and people displayed his body at a butcher shop in Misrata. The fourth stage in the conflict analysis stage is marked by victory, defeat, ceasefire, control, and control. The battle between opposition groups and Gaddafi’s loyalists for nine months (February to October 2011) was won by the opposition group led by the National Transitional Council of Libya (NTC). The end of the war in Libya was followed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) decision to stop all military operations by the end of October 2011 (Akbar, 2015).

5) Aftermath

Aftermath or post-conflict is when violence and tension are slowly reducing and returning to a normal situation. The Libyan civil war that lasted for nine months (February to October 2011) resulted in thousands of deaths. The death toll was approximately 10,000 - 40,000 people, where most of the victims killed were civilians, including women, the elderly, and children. The war in Libya also resulted in refugees coming from Libya to Tunisia and Egypt (Akbar, 2015).

After the civil war ended, the National Transitional Council of Libya (NTC), which won the battle, made several Libya changes to the Libyan government system, wherein the Muammar Gaddafi government’s era used the socialist “Arab Jamahiriya” government system. It was then abolished and replaced with a republican system of government. In the military field, the National Transitional Council of Libya (NTC) made changes from the NTC military to the Libyan national army (Ardiansyah, 2014).

At the final stage of the conflict analysis, if the remaining issues or problems from this conflict are not resolved immediately, it can trigger the pre-conflict stage again. Muammar Gaddafi was shot dead, and the opposition won the battle. However, new problems emerged along with the changes made by the NTC. The reason is, the NTC was formed from various groups with anti-Gaddafi ties. After Gaddafi died, divisions within the NTC began to grow.

Since the Libyan civil war ended, small-scale armed conflicts have continued. These conflicts occurred between remnants of Gaddafi’s loyalist groups and groups within the NTC. There have also been conflicts between ethnic groups and local armed groups (nine years), allowing weapons to circulate freely (Ardiansyah, 2014).

ICRC as International Humanitarian Actor

Jean Henry Dunant established the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC). It is an independent non-governmental organization and neutral on political, religious and ideological issues.
This institution is the Red Cross and Red Crescent Movement’s first organization, with its headquarters in Geneva, Switzerland. The ICRC has approximately 15 to 25 members who are Swiss nationals elected by mutual decision (ICRC, 1996, p. 12). ICRC membership is regulated in Article 7 of the ICRC Statute, which only recruits members from Swiss due to its neutrality, hoping to become an independent intermediary institution in mediating an armed conflict (ICRC, 1996, hal. 2).

If only seen from its membership composition, ICRC is not an international organization because it severely limits its membership to Swiss nationals. However, the ICRC is seen as an international non-governmental organization when viewed from its humanitarian missions worldwide. This organization’s mission is solely humanitarian to assist and protect the lives and dignity of victims of war and domestic violence (ICRC, 2005, hal. 1).

ICRC’s primary duties are to prevent and alleviate human suffering without discrimination and protect human dignity. In carrying out its activities, the ICRC has the basic principles set out in the 20th International Conference of the Red Cross, and Red Crescent held in Vienna, 1965 (ICRC, 1996, hal. 4):

a. Humanity
   ICRC aims for humanitarian actions, such as helping and protecting victims of war without discrimination, preventing and alleviating war victims worldwide.

b. Impartiality
   ICRC does not see race, religion, status, ethnicity and political views. However, it will treat victims differently depending on their state of health and injuries. In terms of humanity, the prohibition of acts of non-discrimination has been regulated in the Geneva Convention 1949 Article 3 Paragraph 1.

c. Neutrality
   ICRC as an organization is not allowed to take sides and involve itself in all matters relating to politics, race, religion and ideology. Besides, ICRC is prohibited from taking any action that could cause more casualties from the conflict parties.

d. Independence
   ICRC provides medical services to assist local governments and comply with existing regulations in each country. However, ICRC must still refuse any interference or intervention from a political, ideological, racial, religious and economic nature to maintain its Independence.

e. Voluntary Service

ICRC works without seeking any profit. The nature of this organization is volunteerism that upholds the human aspect.

f. Unity

National Red Cross aims to help each country’s government form a national association engaged in humanitarian affairs and integrate the branches and the center.

g. Universality

Based on the universality principle, ICRC is recognized throughout the world. With this principle, this institution can provide services and protection to humanity around the world.

ICRC’s Role in Humanitarian Action to Protect Victims of the Libyan Revolution in 2011

The Libyan civil war was the long-term impact of the Arab Spring in the Middle East, especially in Tunisia and Egypt. The civil war in Libya from February to October 2011 caused various kinds of losses. The death toll was approximately 10,000 - 40,000 people, where most of the victims killed were civilians, including women, the elderly, and children. The war also resulted in refugees to countries around Libya, such as Tunisia and Egypt (Akbar, 2015).

The increasing casualties and the influx of Libyan refugees to Tunisia and Egypt sparked various international community responses. One of them was the response given by the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) as a non-governmental organization with a humanitarian mission. The primary mission of the ICRC is to assist and protect the lives and dignity of victims and violence at home or abroad without discrimination. ICRC is protected by International Humanitarian Law and the Geneva Conventions of 1969.

According to the ICRC President, Jacob Kellenberger, in 2011, spent approximately Rp. 11.3 Trillion to provide humanitarian assistance in 80 countries, including Libya (ICRC, 2012). The following are some of the roles of the ICRC’s humanitarian actions to assist and protect victims of the Libyan Civil War, which culminated in September-October 2011.
a. In September 2011, the ICRC helped reunite separated families through the transfer of people between Tripoli and Benghazi and between Benghazi and Tripoli. These people were separated from their families in January 2011 due to the Civil War (ICRC, 2011).

b. Civil War in Sirte, Libya, led to an increasing influx of refugees. The refugees stated that the stock of medicines, food, water, health access was minimal. The refugees began to catch fever and diarrhea because they did not have access to toilets. The refugees fled from Sirte to the desert between the cities of Sirte and Harawa. On September 26, 2011, the ICRC provided humanitarian assistance consisting of water and hygiene kits to approximately 7,800 refugees and 57,000 baby food bottles. It also distributed hygiene kits, diapers, food, water and kitchen utensils to approximately 859 refugees in Misrata and Tamina and 700 refugees in Wadi Mara (ICRC, 2011).

c. Civil War in Libya caused a wave of refugees inside Libya and spread to Tunisia. It mainly caused water resources in the border of Southeast Tunisia to become increasingly depleted. In September 2011, ICRC collaborated with the Tunisian National Water Management Agency to build 15.5 kilometers of water pipelines to connect wells with water reservoirs for 100,000 refugees in Ben Guerdane and Ramada (ICRC, 2011).

d. Apart from constructing a water pipeline and medical assistance, ICRC also deployed two of its forensic experts to help Libyans identify mass buried bodies and help Libyans find their families who have been reported missing since the civil war broke out (ICRC, 2012).

e. On October 3, 2011, ICRC, led by a doctor named Hichem Khadraoui, managed to break through Sirte, pro-Gaddafi groups and conflicting opposition. He stated that an increasing number of injured victims were being admitted to the Ibn Sina Hospital in Sirte. The situation was exacerbated by the depletion of medical equipment and oxygen and damaged water reservoirs. ICRC team successfully provided surgical equipment for more than 200 wounded victims, bandages, body bags, and 400 liters of fuel to run hospital generators (ICRC, 2011).

f. On October 7, 2011, ICRC officers successfully evacuated three critical patients, 17 patients on October 11, 2011, and 21 patients on October 17, 2011, to be transferred from Ibn Sina Hospital to Misrata. In October 2011, 58 patients were successfully evacuated. Three patients needed intensive care, while doctors in Sirte City were decreasing due to the closure and blocking of access roads leading to Sirte. The evacuation could only be done when the opposition group and the pro-Gaddafi group agreed on a ceasefire for several hours (ICRC, 2011).

g. ICRC made visits to 50 places of detention in Libya, more than 6,000 detainees in Tripoli and 2,500 detainees in Misrata. One thousand five hundred detainees were foreign nationals from sub-Saharan Africa. The purpose of conducting these visits was to monitor the shelters. It also provided detainees opportunities to contact their families, clothing, sheets, mattresses, buckets and toiletries for detainees (ICRC, 2011).

h. In October 2011, ICRC provided humanitarian assistance to more than 30,000 Libyan refugees in Libya. The humanitarian aid consisted of clothes, water, food, diapers, hygiene kits, baby food, and milk (ICRC, 2011).

Providing humanitarian in Libya done by ICRC is challenging because humanitarian fighters are targets of armed groups. Indeed, the volunteers are supposed to save other humans’ lives. Ambulances, medical personnel, medical facilities must be respected and protected by all parties. Benghazi and Misrata's ICRC headquarters experienced five armed attacks in the past three months (ICRC, 2012). The armed attacks continued and were directed directly to the ICRC headquarters in Libya. The ICRC team urged the Libyan government to make a memorandum of understanding. On June 26, 2012, ICRC and the Libyan Armed Forces signed a memorandum of understanding, under which ICRC would assist and support integrating the rules of International Humanitarian Law into the training and operations of the Libyan Armed Forces and in the Libyan Military Law, considering Libya was a party to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocols I and II (ICRC, 2012). The signing of this memorandum of understanding is the first step for Libya to ensure International Humanitarian Law in Libya.

CONCLUSION

Libyan Revolution is the long-term impact of the Arab Spring in the Middle East region. The revolution that occurred in 2011 led to the outbreak of civil war from February to October 2011 and caused various kinds of losses. The Libyan Civil War’s death toll was approximately 10,000 - 40,000 people, where most of the victims killed were civilians, including women, the elderly, and children.
